RAG BEES.

A hostess invites her friends to come on a certain day to help her sew carpet rags, make mats, or in some other economical way to use up the old, worn out clothes, etc.

Probably there is another object in view for it is one of the splendid opportunities for gossip. Generally they will choose somebody whom they know very little about, and draw on their imagination, allowing their jealous mind and evil spirit to get control of them.

In many instances the hostess leads in the fault, for if she were a true friend to others, would she allow such things to be said? Could she not exercise a little tact and easily change the subject, introducing something which would be a benefit to talk about, and learn something edifying by exchanging views on a worthy subject?

Some people live their religious life on Sundays only. I once heard the remark from a member of this circle, who had just returned from attending one of these gatherings, "they had a dull time, no fun, could not say anything because the minister's wife was there."
