Penal labor is unknown, and the male prisoners are employed in such light and pleasing work as woodcarving, illuminating, turning, and leather-dressing, varied by farming for those who prefer a more nuscular, open-air life. A fair share of the earnings goes to the workers, who are thus enabled to provide delicacies for themselves, and, general. ly, the conditions, in some at least of the Prussian prisons, are made so pleasant that a prisoner may well be more comfortable inside than outside their walls.

In one or other of these prisons Heinrich Hoffmann has spent no less than sixty years of his life, during the whole of which period he has not aggregated a single year of freedom. As the chaplain of one of these prisons wrote a few months ago in the National Zeitung :-"I have never seen a man in any station of life so perfectly happy in his lot as Hoffmann. He is a man of gifts which might have raised him to an excellent position in the world outside, but he declares to me he would not change places with term expires he is always back with-
