Aunt Harriet's Thanksgiving Burglar

Very timid we felt, for we were alone in the house, Aunt Harriet and I, she having sent John to town to bank some money which had been paid her unexpectedly. I don't know what the hour was, but it was quite dark in the room when I was awakened by Aunt Harriet, telling the old rifle off its hook over the bed. A man trying to get into the house, she told me in a hoarse whisper, she'd seen him with his own eyes.

Heard a queer, picking, picking noise from Aunt Harriet's room, I jumped out of bed, unlocked the door, and I heard the rustling of the floor. Aunt Harriet, kneeling on the window ledge and jiggled the rusty trigger. The burglar was followed by the fall of a heavy body on the kitchen steps. Aunt Harriet, in a hoarse whisper, she'd seen him with his own eyes. She'd seen him with his own eyes.

I sat on the edge of the bed, shivering with cold and fright, until broad daylight, and then I went down stairs, opened the kitchen door, and I saw the burglar, a tall, thin man, with a mustache, wearing a top hat and a long coat. He was carrying a bundle under his arm. I called out to him, and he turned back. I saw him with his own eyes.

Just "two shakes of a lamb's tail," was on my mind, and I was on my feet, ready to follow him. I saw him with his own eyes. I saw him with his own eyes. I saw him with his own eyes.

I saw him with his own eyes. I saw him with his own eyes. I saw him with his own eyes. I saw him with his own eyes. I saw him with his own eyes.

I saw him with his own eyes. I saw him with his own eyes. I saw him with his own eyes. I saw him with his own eyes. I saw him with his own eyes.
