LABOR UNIONS AND THE SALOON.

(Toronto Globe.)

A strong and ringing note leaders of America at Masssey Hall yesterday afternoon. It was the note of open and uncompromising antagonism to the saloon. There was no mincing. There was no saying clauses. Straight from the shoulder the blow was struck. All fellowship between labor unions and the saloon was denounced. Without reserve or equivocation, and in the name of international labor, endorsed by four thousand men with the right to speak, the liquor traffic was condemned as an enemy of the workingman, a burden on his life, and a curse to his home.

The significance of yesterday's declarations is very great. It means a fresh rally of the forces making for sobriety and a new social order. It signalizes the deliverance of a great host of the world's workers from a bondage that has for generations in Britain and in America, been blight on the vitality and a bar to the progress of the labor movement.

And yesterday's declaration of labor's independence against the dominance of the saloon either in the politics of labor or in the social life of the laborer was no sudden or unconsidered outburst of emotional fanaticism. It was the deliberate pronouncement of a profound conviction. That conviction has grown out of bitter experiences. It is fortified with sound economic arguments. It will increase in power and influence with every step in the progress of the labor movement.

The labor leaders of America study economics first and at short range. They know right well that the work of the saloon is to weaken the muscle, to defile the blood, to make unsteady the nerve, and to cloud the brain. They know, too, that the workingman who spends money with which to buy food and clothes and a home for his family. Knowing this, they and their men with them say in the frankest and most resolute tone that the time is come when the labor movement and the liquor traffic must take opposite sides, stand divorced from each other, and never meet except for war to the knife, with every knife to the hilt. That is the meaning of yesterday's challenge.
