SHELBURNE

Mr. O. Rands, our genial mail carrier, met with a painful accident on Thursday morning last. While walking up the sidewalk he slipped and fell, striking his head on the ice, and received such a blow as to fracture his skull. He is now lying in a very precarious condition, but we hope he may soon recover.

The council has raised the dog tax in our burg to $2.50 for males and $5.00 for females. Between the extra tax and the necessity of putting muzzles on them, there will likely be a number of the useless curs put out of business, which is badly needed.

A number of our curlers went down to Erin to try conclusions with those of that village, and after playing all night we understand they came out with one game each. This is the only game our curlers have lost this season, which is a good record.

WHEN THE FARMER MOVES TO TOWN

When a farmer begins to talk about moving to town it is for one or perhaps two very common reasons. He wants to move to town to take life easy, or to educate the children, or to go into business, or to secure more comforts and luxuries and advantages for his family, says a writer in the Breeders' Gazette.

If he moves to town to educate the children he speedily makes some important discoveries. He finds that instead of being cheaper, it is much more expensive than he dreamed. The average farmer finds out that he might better have boarded the youngsters at a hotel as a means of saving money. Taking the proceeds of an ordinary farm and trying to live off the interest is risky business, as many farmers have found to their sorrow. If you want to hear the value of country produce eloquently set forth, go to the man who has moved to town recently, and is finding out the price of provisions for the first time. How he envies the farmer who sends his children to school every morning in a comfortable storm buggy and gets them back at night. In despair he takes a situation somewhere at an inferior salary because totally inuse to town work, and wishes himself on his farm. He also finds out that the children will be through school in a few years and will be in homes of their own or in business most likely, while he has nothing in the way of good prospects ahead of him for the rest of his days.

If he moves to town to "retire," he soon finds he has accomplished his purpose too thoroughly for enjoyment. There is a healthy sentiment against idleness, and even a well-to-do man who loafs all the time soon finds out that he is considered a bore and a loafer. Of course an aged man is not shunned or ill treated, but a middle-aged man who gives up the active pursuits of farm life to loaf indefinitely has few real friends in his new surroundings, while a young man who does such a thing will not be tolerated at all. But the most pathetic things happen when the farmer moves to town to go into business. It seems to be a sort of disease a man gets when he decides that the farm is altogether too slow for him and he will get rich faster in town. Against the advice of his friends and kindred he sells out and puts his money in a new and untried venture, to lose it sooner or later in ninety-nine cases out of every hundred.

And the man who moves to town for social advantages makes some unpleasant discoveries also. He finds out to his surprise, that the rules governing polite society in the country do not obtain in the town. In the country all respectable people are on the same footing, while in the average small city little groups or circles or cliques, whatever they may be called, are all-sufficient. One disappointed woman said that it was easier to get into heaven than into the charmed circles of many small towns. The country people find themselves, in many cases like fish out of water, out of touch with their old friends and on the outskirts of society in town. And they also find out that town pleasures cost a lot of money and that entertaining is elaborate even in small places. The man who feels that he will better himself by leaving the farm much not expect too much, or he will be sadly disappointed. He must expect just as many disadvantages as the country had and must know that it takes a great deal more money to live in town in comfort than it does in the country. Many a man who moved to town in order to have electric lights, running water and other luxuries has discovered too late that he might better have put in those conveniences and remained on the farm. City life is pleasant and has many advantages, but so has country life, and the farmer who decides that the town has all the good things and the country none is not likely to succeed anywhere, because he expects too much.

THE BOYS IN WEST WANT WIVES

"Madame," the clever writer of the woman's front page of Saturday Night had the following interesting article last week:

With girls in the East wanting husbands, and men in the West wanting wives—what steps should be taken to bring them together? That is the gist of the letter I have received from a man out West who protests against the general belief that it is a mistake for a girl to promise to marry a man whom she had never seen. "There are lots of us out here," he writes, "who have good prospects and comfortable homes, but have no time to go East looking for wives. We are lonely and need companionship. Can't something be done to bring us together with the girls who really want homes of their own and who are willing to give up something in the way of luxury?"

The appeal seems genuine, and if it is not the fact remains that there is many a man in our own Northwest who is deprived of the opportunity of meeting girls from whom he would care to select a wife. Matrimonial bureaus are more or less in repute, and matrimonial advertisements are usually things to be shunned as one would the plague. Now and again a newspaper of repute which has a circulation in country districts will manage a correspondence column by means of which addresses and letters may be exchanged and these in some instances have been known to lead to happy marriages.

Undoubtedly, however, there is an element of danger in such a courtship which makes the future look less bright than when an engagement to marry is reached in the conventional way through more or less personal acquaintance. A woman who marries for a home runs a big risk, and the man who marries in order to have a housekeeper usually finds out that bachelorhood was the better condition. No two people can feel secure as to their future unless they know each other's good and bad points, and are prepared to make allowances for them. It is usually only in magazine tales that this modernized "young archer" business spells anything but ultimate disaster. My belief is that while it may be unpleasant to be lonesome, it is ever so much worse to be yoked to an incongenial companion. The most carefully planned marriages so often turn out failures, that it seems useless to expect anything better of the hazardous kind.

That such marriages are to be considered very carefully before being finally entered upon was evidently the opinion of a girl who had pledged herself to marry a man in one of the Western States. She had corresponded with him and had allowed him to send her gifts of money. When he appeared on the scene, ready and willing to marry her, she went back on her bargain, and accepted a jail sentence in lieu of a husband. And she said she was willing. Her objections to him were many, and included the fact that his eyesight was failing, that he carried his money in a woollen stocking instead of a pocket book, and that his clothes were ugly on him, and that in short he failed to come up to her ideal. This last is the majority of such cases is the majority of all the trouble, for men and women cherish ideals no matter how practical they imagine themselves, and those have an unhappy faculty of pushing to the fore just when one thinks they are dead and done with.

Bob Cook Sentenced.

Orangeville, Feb. 21.—The case against "Bob" Cook, which was partly heard before Police Magistrate Patullo a week ago, was concluded at the Court House this morning. The accused was charged with slashing nightwatchman Jas. Halbert on the night of October 30 last when that officer was endeavoring to effect his arrest on a charge of disorderly conduct at the house of his mother-in-law, Mrs. Reid, earlier in the day. The Magistrate found Cook guilty. He said there was no doubt the knife was used against the officers deliberately to keep them at bay. He could impose a sentence of 14 years, but would impose a short sentence of two years in Kingston Penitentiary.
