CHAPTER IV (Cont'd.) Every man has some portion of self love. So his next effort was a passionate denial that he was "nice." When should he meet her? The postman brought him a letter which contained one word-Nimmer! He sent her four pages, a frank and witty description of himself and his friends. .

On the day she received this letter a cablegram came to her from the far Mediterranean. Whatever it contained had the effect to cause all restraint to disappear from the tone of her letters. They became charming, and more and more Hillard found himself loving a voice. All his watching, all his traps, came to no successful end. She was too clever for him. He sought the mail department of the great newspaper; the clerk couldn't remember, there were so many calling for mail. Letters passed to and fro daily now, but always she declared that it was impossible for them to meet. No, it was out of the question to dine with him in restaurant. It was equally out of the question to cook a dinner where she lived, as she and her maid dined at a small restaurant near by. Finally he proposed to bring the dinner all cooked from the club. Two days went by without a sign; then the blue letter surrender. The most fatal thing in life is curiosity. It has the power to lead us into all manner of trouble. And I have my share of curiosity. Remember, you never would have found me. I may dwell in a garret; I may be hideous; perhaps nothing remains to me but my voice. And now the terms. And if you do not follow them confidently and blindly your dinner will grow cold in the carriage. Dinner will be at 8, Feb. 1. At 7 a carriage will call for you. The messenger will blindfold you. He will then proceed to the club and take the dinner and bring you here. Be warned! If you so much as lift the corner of the bandage, the romance will end then and there. I realize that I am doing something very foolish and unwise; but, as you say, I am a woman who has seen much of the world. Thus I have my worldly side. I shall use "Blindfolded!" Hillard scrubbed his chin. 'All these precautions! Who was she? What was she? Since there was no escape, blindfolded he would go. At half after 6 on the night of the 1st of February, then, he began to dress. It was some time sinc taken such particular care.

"The signor seems in high spirits pnight," observed Giovanni as he laid out the linen.

"Man, I'm happy and greatly ex cited. Do you recollect the lady who ang under my window? I am going nd meet her tonight. The mystery wil be a mystery no longer."

"Ab!" Giovanni stroked his line doubtfully. "It is not like the signor to plunge blindly into adventures like "The very word, blindly. I go blindfolded, amico. What do you think of that?"

"Blindfolded?" Giovanni was horri fied. "It is a trap!" he cried. "They will assassinate you! No; you shall not go! In Rome, at the carnivals, it is an old game. They will rob you." "Take the number of the cab as I get in. If anything should happen, give the number to the police.".

Giovanni, with a sharp movement of the hands, expressed his resignation to the worst. He knew the futility of rguing with his master. But he followed him down to the hall and tied on the bandage himself. He was honest about it, too, for Hillard could see nothing. Then the messenger boy took him by the hand and led him to the carriage. As the two were climbing in Giovanni spoke rapidly in his native tongue.

"There is no number on the car-

By and by the carriage stopped. "Dis is where we alights, me loid!" the boy jeered. "An' no lookin', mind." Hillard found the carriage steps and landed safely. He stood for a moment, listening. They were in a quiet part of the city; no elevated or surface. cars were near. He was assured that the location was exclusive. Garrets are not to be found in quiet places.

"Look out fer th' steps," said the boy, again taking Hillard by the hand. "And you be careful of that basket." "I ain't lettin' it drop any."

Winding steps, thought the blindfolded man. He could recollect none. It seemed to him that they stood there five minutes before the door opened. When it did, the boy passed in the basket and resolutely pushed Hillard into the hall. The door closed gently, and the adventure was begun. Whither would it lead him?

"Take off the bandage the signor may now." said a voice in broken Eng-

"Thanks!" He tore the handkerchief from his eyes and blinked. The hall was so dimly lighted that he could see nothing distinctly.

"The signor's coat and hat." He passed over these articles, shook the wrinkles from his trousers, smoothed his chin and stood at attention. The maid eyed him with abundant approv-leading to the drawing room. "Avanti!" called a soft voice. Hillard gathered in his courage, opened the door and stepped inside. On a divan near a lamp sat a woman in black. Only a patch of white throat could be seen, for her shoulders were not bare and her arms only to the elbows. Her back was turned squarely. But what a head! He caught his breath. It glowed like a copper beech in the sunshine. "Madam?" he faltered. He spoke English and not very firmly. The woman turned. Hillard took a step backward and blundered against a pedestal.

She was masked! Masked! Only her mouth and chin were visible, and several little pieces of court plaster effectually disguised these. There was a mystery. He to come blindfolded and she to wear a mask-extraordinary!

"And this," she said ironically, "is man who leaned out of the
