The Intoxicated Passenger

There is a strong opinion prevailing among railway officials in Canada that a law should be passed on the statute books to enable railway officials to deal promptly with that not uncommon nuisance—an intoxicated passenger. Especially is some measure of protection in this respect desirable in the interests of ladies and children who may be travelling in public conveyances. When an intoxicated individual or individuals have paid their fare on a car, or a railway train or on a steamboat, they make themselves as objectionable as they please to the other passengers, but more particularly in the case of land conveyances the officials in charge are helpless to control them except by remonstrance, at least until they have reached some point in the journey where a constable can be secured to take them in charge. Usually remonstrances on the part of a railway official only make the intoxicated person more boisterous and more obnoxious.

The suggestion has been made that in Canada it would be well if Parliament would enact a law similar to that existing in the State of Illinois, which makes it an offence punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both, for any person to drink intoxicating liquor or to be intoxicated on any passenger train, or in or about any railway station. The act also gives a railway conductor the power to arrest such a person and keep him in custody until he can be handed over to a police officer at the first convenient station. In addition to that conductor who refuses or neglects to perform his duty is guilty of an offence and on the complaint of the other passengers can be summoned and fined for neglect of duty. Such a law should be effective in protecting passengers from the very common nuisance.
