LETTER- WRITING.

Side, and Chest How the Roman Citizen Conducted His Correspondence.

Modern letter-writing involves more superfluous forms than the an cients used. There was an admirable directness and brevity, in the Roman method of correspondence, as we can see from the letters of

He began most of his communications in this manner: "To Sextilius Rufus, Quaestor," or "To Acilius, Proconsol": and when he had finished his letter, he usually stopped with the simple "Vale." Mr. Harris has been experiment has never been without Nerviline. I had a dreadful attack of cold, that some time ago he noticed a healthy settled on my chest that founteen different remedies couldn't break up. I day, used Nerviline as a gargle, and farewell," or "Farewell, and con-was completely restored. I have in-tinue to love me." But nine letters in ten he began with the name of the person addressed, and ended with the single word 'Farewell." Sometimes a Roman citizen who had received a great favor from a superior would put an expression of thanks at the end of his letter as when Marcus Marcellus says to Cicero "I shall try to convince you that you have conferred your good offices upon one who is most sin cerely and warmly your friend Farewell." But this is an unusual y long formula for a Roman,

During medieval times a more elaborate, form of letter-writing The railway ticket collector in flourished, and it eventually grew England put his head in at the car- into a most extravagant mode of epistolatory homage, that prevailed until the beginning of the nine teenth century.

Our forefathers were as cere monious and elaborate in their let-ters as they were in their drawingroom manners. Thus, in 1762, Wil liam Pitt concludes a letter to the mayor of Norwich thus: "I am. with truest respect and unalterable attachment, sir, your most obedient and obliged humble servant:"

But even this was moderate compared with the forms often used in addressing persons of high rank and royalty. In writing to Frederick the Great, in 1771, d'Alembert conoludes a letter in this style: "Be pleased to accept, sire, with your usual goodness, the ardent prayers I offer up for the preservation of Grandmother - Why, Bennie, your precious life and for the prosperity of your undertakings, and for such a very little boy! that you may enjoy that glory and Bennie—Yes, Grandma, I know I happiness which Your Majesty so ain't very big, but I've got an aw much morite, With these sentimente, as well as with the tenderest and most profound respect, which I shall to the lest maintain, I am, sire of Your Majesty the most humble and affectionate servant,"

The French carried extravagance of this sort to the greatest extremes, but they were also the first to referm it, for during the Revoluped all epistolatory forms, and re-turned to the simplicity and brevity of the Romans. Thus, Napoleon Bonaparte, unless he were writing to the ruler of another country, rarely had any "beginning" or "ending" to his letters. His letters, before his accession to Imper al power, began and ended in the Roman manner, except that he did not even trouble himself to write the equivalent of "Vale."

It is strange that England, so much despised as the home of democracy by full-blooded autocrats, is generally their home when local democracy gets tired of them. French kings have come to Claremont, Holyrood and Chislehurst, and the French Empress is a Farnborough.

The present Kaiser's grandfather. the great William I., was a resident of Carlton House Terrace when as Prince of Prussia Berlin was too hot for him. It is so long ago to be quite forgotten, but Prince Chrisian's residence there is a compensation for his loss of the throne of Denmark.

When Alphonse Daudet wrote 'Les Rois en Exil" Paris was their usual home, but the air of a repub lic to-day seems only suiter to the taste of Russian grand dukes. They still remain faithful to "the city of light" with the exception of one, who prefers Hampstead.
