Her Great Love; Or, A Struggle For a Heart

"It is worth living for!" she repeated, with a choking laugh. "To think of it! She snatched up a book from the small table near her, and turned to the inner cover, which bore his name and title. 'The book that I love,' she read, 'is the one that I have chosen for my name. It is the one that I have chosen for my name. It is the one that I have chosen for my name.'"

As she rose to her feet she uttered a cry, a cry like that of a wild bird balked of its revenge. Gaunt looked at the overturned table and saw, with indifference, the most calm of the door.

"Did you call, sir?" asked the maid outside. "No," said Gaunt, and she went away. "Take care," said Laura, hoarsely, as she pushed the door from behind her.

"You don't know what I can do! You talk of your name—the disgrace and shame! I will tell you the whole story! I will tell you the whole story! I will tell you the whole story! I will tell you the whole story!"

"You don't deny it?" she went on, scanning his face. "I know that look! I know that look! I know that look! I know that look!"

"You don't deny it?" she went on, scanning his face. "I know that look! I know that look! I know that look! I know that look!"
