She leaned forward, and rocked herself to and fro. The anguish in her heart was like a physical pain racking and tearing at her.

She knew what she ought to do. She cought to cease loving him from that moment. It was her duty, her column duty, to tear his image from her fierry; to love him no longer, to forget him.

But, alas, for poor human hattie! she found she could not do this.

It is only the impossible leroires in simpossible, goody-goody nevels who, when they have discovered that the man thou love is unworthy of them, or married to another woman, rise and nobly crush down their, love, and cast it from their hearts.

Oh, why could she not die? It would said; and Decima closed her be so good to die now, this moment, with his dear voice ringing in her dare, his kisses still warm upon her liph! She had not been so very wicked; she had tried to lead the good life Aunt Pauline had hed up for her. Would not Heaven be merciful and let her die? If they could only both, die together, he and she, hand in had, looking into each other's eyes, and passing away from this cruel world into that other of peace and rest!

Lady Pauline bent over her.

I promise. Be satisfied, do said; and Decima closed her drew a long sigh of relief.

CHAPTER IXIX.

Decima found herself standing on the pavement outside the Mansions. She was scarcely conscious of how she had got there. She had put on her thing mechanically, hurriedly, and had fed from the house with funcertain feet.

As mechanically, hurriedly, she went up the street, and, at the cage of the larger and busier thoroughfare, stood gazing vacantly before her.

A passing cably hailed her, and she larger and busier thoroughfare, stood gazing vacantly before her.

A passing cably hailed her, and she got in. But she did not think to tell the man where she wished to be driven, and had to ask her twize through the window in the roof before she dould roply.

At Lady Pauline's door she stood a moment, looking up and down the street, with the same expression in her eyes: for, she was asking herself she became before her eyes; again and again it seemed to her that he was bend ing over her, and she put out her hand as if to thrust him away, sobbing:

"No. no! She is you'r wife. It is she whom you love, not me! You must not touch mo, kies me!"

Toward morning she fell into the deep really she, Decima Deane, who was stand let her in.

Oh, it is you miss!" she said, garrulously. "I've lighted a bit of a fire in your room, thinking it would be composed to the composed to the composed to the woman, and she turned and looked at her?.

"You seem tired, miss?" she said. The woman lighted some candles, and looked round tentatively.

oause she had worn it in her hair How happy, happy! Then suddenly a pang of anguish amote her. But what had happened? Why did this terrible weight, this dragging fear and shame. Then she forced herself to remember, and as she recalled the discovery of the portrait, his words "My wife" and albat had passed afterward, she opened her eyes and covered them with her hand, and a low cry of misery broke from her with and trembling lips.

"What could have happened?" she said:

"That we have to discover," he said, quietly. "She must be kept quiet; but you know the treatment as well as I do, Lady Pauline." Lady Pauline had for a days. "I'll come back in an hour or two. Keep the ice bandages going; and if she abould recover consciousness before I return, keep her as tranquil as possible.

Lady Pauline stood beside the ted with white and trembling lips. Lady Pauline stood beside the ted with tightly compressed lips and aching heart. What had they done to this girl whom she loved with a mother's love? The charwoman stole in presently, and Lady Pauline questioned her. She could tell no more than the doctor had already told. Lady Pauline sent her with a wire for the servants to return, and resumed her place beside the unconscious girl. The doctor came in again within his time.

"Something has happened to her-some shock," he said. "I can do nothing for ther that you can not do, Lady Pauline. Absolute quiet, tranquility, that is all."

The hours drugged through, Later Lady Pauline saw the white spelling quiver, and presently Decima looked up at her. Pauline saw the white eyelids quiver, and presently Decima looked up at her. "Aunt Pauline?" she said in the thin,

"Yese dear."

"Will you please tell Mr. Mershon that I can not marry him?"
Lady Pauline repressed a start. Was the poor child delirious? But Decima smiled again, as if she read the question, the doubt.

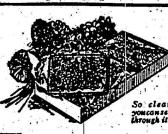

"No; I am quite sensible, deer," she said. "I promised Mr. Mershon. But, you see, I didn't know then that I loyed him." "Him? Who?" asked Lady Pauline. "Decima stared at her as if surprised that the question should be necessary. "Lord Gaunt," she said, quiety.
Lady Pauline could not repress the start now.
"Isrd Gaunt?" she cenced.
