Telephone Abused.

(Thornbury Review-Herald.) The telephone is a mighty useful little instrument, but at times it is one of the biggest nuisances in a dog's age. As an instance of the latter nature, the calling-up of employees in offices, stores, etc., during business hours, is the most glaring and exasperating. It is not the fault of the employees that this is done, and perhaps if the truth were known, something could be said in extenuation of the persons responsible for this particular nuisance. Business people are not frankly and fearlessly take steps to stamp out the practice. Where there is urgent need to get an employee in a hurry, there can be no serious objections raised for the use of the phones occasionally during business hours; but when it comes to calling up busy people for the mere purpose of discussing trivialities of a purely personal nature, the sorely tried patience of the business man has about reached the limit of human endurance. Business telephones were primarily intended for business purposes and not for idle gossip, but of late years this phase of the matter has suffered a severe relapse. No wonder people often talk of throwing out the phones for this one reason. The only wonder is that many of them do not actually put their mental resolutions into practical effect occasionally.
