GASES IN WARFARE.

Are the Most Virulent and Irritant of

That the Germans were determined to break the agreement of the Hague mised to abstain from the use of all asphyxiating gases is evident from the fact that their patent office rebe made full length or shorter as pre-ferred. The four-gore skirt finishes gun for throwing poisonous gas bombs some years before the war. The pattern cuts in sizes 32 to 14 The specifications show that it would incles bust measure, requiring in size throw a 150-pound bombra distance of 36, 7% yards 27-inch, 6% yards 36-400 yards, causing the death of every-400 yards, causing the death of everybody within a radius of 400 feet. The use of asphyxiating gases in the form of bombs and other contrivances is really a revival of the ancient methods of warfare applied to modern conditions. The gas bomb is a modernized "stink-pot," which the Chinese have employed from time immemorial; but whereas the old Chinese "stink-pot" merely rendered men unconscious, poisonous gases employed to-day are the most virulent and irritant of poisons, and few men recover from the effects after they have inhaled the gas to any extent. .
