HORRIBLE BUTCHERY.

Hungarian committee entrusted with the care of the graves of soldiers have issued a report which is stated that their remains in the northern Carpathians resulted in the discovery after 260,000 graves of Austrian and German soldiers, says Budapest correspondent of the New Herald. Of these 36,000 reburied graves where more than half are interred. The crosses themselves were unmarked, and where they were known identified. The figures given indicate the winter of 1914-15 many were killed in the battle of that region a fact never recorded. The publication of port in question therefore has the greatest depression, for it is known that the majority of the dead were engaged there against us.

They were composed of Hungarians, a small fraction of the being German and Austrian.

Crucifixion on the shores of Lake Balaton was put out that at the Russians were the attacking force.

Now we are the attackers, as hardly necessary to say by the writer. "What the devil is the winter of 1914-15 had to do with the millions that have died and will die during the next 17 years?" He would reflect the manner of life in a desolate campament between the beginning of 1914-15 in the Carpathians offers no encouragement for relief.

Onward to the front Post Patriarchal have a vast army of 700,000 men are here identifying the graves.

"The work has almost before the snow covers the ground and the floods wash all traces of the remains of those who have fallen." They therefore have but a very short time to live.

YOUNG FOLKS

The Day That Carries the Lantern. Late every afternoon in the fall and winter, when the sun goes down in the shadows, get thick under the trees in the yard, Mrs. Raymond takes a lantern that hangs in her kitchen and gives it to Rusty, the big dog.

Rusty takes the handle into his mouth and holds his head high, partly to keep the lantern from touching the ground and partly because he is proud and partly because he is trained on an important errand. He walks off along a winding path he leads through the woods to a station about a quarter of a mile away. There he waits on the platform for the train that brings Mr. Raymond from the city. Then Mr. Raymond comes with the lantern and gives it to Rusty, and the two set off together along the winding path to the station where a good supper is waiting for both of them.

RATTLING UNDER THE SEA.

Microphones, or Electrical Ears, For Submarines.

Although the submarine is blind after it dives, it can be made to hear with the aid of microphones, or electrical ears. Mr. Edward F. Chandler, an inventor who has made a study of submarine problems, has invented a method by which he believes a submerged craft may direct its course toward a hostile ship.

In describing the process in Popular Science Monthly, he says: In the modern telephone the transmitter is essentially a microphone, and the pressure of the sound waves is communicated to the conductors by means of a diaphragm. The submarine, equipped with microphones on the port and starboard bows, telephones enable the submarine commander to listen to the sounds gathered by the microphones.

If the submarine is not pointed head-on toward the ship it means to attack, the microphones on the off-side will receive fewer vibrations than the others; and the difference in the volume of sound received by the two microphone detectors will be observed at once by the telephone receivers.

The commander will then change his course until he hears equally well with both earpieces.

Although it is perfectly feasible to direct a submarine by telephone, it is much more effective to convert the microphone vibrations into visual sounds. As a result, the commander of a submarine has only to watch a finger move over a dial in order to know what course he should steer.

On that night he started for the station as usual, with the lantern bumping against him as he trotted slowly along. There was ample time, and so did not hurry. Just as he was passing through a little hollow about halfway through the woods, he heard something off to one side of the path that made him stop short. It was the sound of a child crying, and Rusty, in a sense, he sees the sound that the microphone detectors hear.

A visual steering indicator is primarily depended upon to guide the submarine, but telephones are connected with the microphones, to be used when occasion arises. With their aid, one underwater sound can be distinguished from another and interpreted correctly. A tramp steamer may be microphonically distinguished from a Mauretania, a torpedo boat from a superdreadnought, and, above all, a subsurface craft from a surface craft. Thus you can tell the character of an unseen ship while it is still a long distance off.

This outfit will be within hailing distance of the record bicycle production reached in the years 1895-97, when bicycles were turned out at the rate of over 1,200,000 per annum.

In Canada the rejuvenation of the bicycle is equally marked, nearly 100,000 machines being manufactured and sold during 1916. This is practically a doubling up on the sales of 1915, and but for the shortage of labor and tubing the number would have been still further increased. The outlook for 1917 is exceptionally bright and orders from the trade are already booked for Spring delivery which breaks all previous records for like period.

The increasing demand comes from workmen who use the bicycle for going to and from work, from boys and girls using them for pleasure and for
