The Bride's Name;

Or, The Adventures of Captain Fraser

CHAPTER XIV.—(Cont'd.).
"Well, I don't know much about it," said the housekeeper, looking round appealingly. "I heard some speaking to somebody at the door in a low voice."

"It wasn't a low voice," interrupted Mrs. Banks sharply.

"Well, I couldn't hear what you were saying, and then when you went outside and I asked you whether you were going home, you said 'yes,' didn't you?"

"Are you sure she said she was going home?" said Mrs. Banks's brother-in-law, in a low voice, as the old lady sank back in her chair.

"Yes," said Miss Church, with a smile of relief.

There was a dead silence, during which they all heard the smouldering salts drop.

"If this man said Captain Barber was ill at Mapheden, why didn't you tell me?" continued Mrs. Church, in a mildly aggrieved voice. "I think if anybody ought to have known it, it should have been me."

"It's still a fuss about nothing," said Mr. Green, brazenly. "She slipped out a bit too late, and then wanted to put it all on me."

A good Samaritan picked up the smouldering salts and held them to the victim's nose, while the scandalised relatives discussed the situation. The law eyed her with bewildered disapproval, and in the disjointed accents peculiar to surprise was heard to make use of the words "friskiness" and "gallivanting" and "old enough to know better."

Her relatives' remarks, however, caused Mrs. Banks comparatively little pain. Her attention was fully taken up by the housekeeper, in whose satisfied smile she saw a perfect recognition of the reasons for her action of the previous evening. She got up from her chair, and with a smile which her brother-in-

CHAPTER XV.
The "Blue Posts," Chelsea, is an old-time public-house pleasantly situated by the river, with an extensive connection amongst gentlemen's servants, busmen, and other skilled judges of good beer, the subtle and delicate perfume of which liquor pervades the place from cellar to garret, and has more than once taken the police on the duty to the back door, under the impression that something wanted looking into.

To the men imprisonment in such a place would have been little short of ecstasy. In the heat of the cool cellar amid barrels of honest beer, the winter, they would have had the opportunity of surprising, and "old enough to know better."

Mrs. Banks comparatively fit the pain. Her attention was fully taken up by the housekeeper, in whose satisfied smile she saw a perfect recognition of the reasons for her action of the previous evening.

She got up from her chair, and with a smile which her brother-in-

London—Do you wear glasses? Are you a victim of eye strain or other eye weakness? You will be glad to know that according to Dr. James Tipping, you can get rid of your eyes by following the principles of this wonderful prescription. Here is the prescription:

Go to your optician and get a bottle of Re-Ojo tablets. Drop one tablet in a glass of water and allow to dissolve. Take a glassful of this water twice a day, and the late feeding at night takes the attendant to the barn where he can see that everything is all right, and tends to keep the horses quiet until morning. Farmer's Advice:

"I put up more than that for your sake," said Farmer.

"I can hardly believe it," she said coyly.

Flower, who was in the same predicament, patted her head tenderly as being easier than replying.

"And I must say," said Mrs. Tipping, regarding the pair, "I'm a plain woman, and I speak my mind, that if it was all I should want to know more about him first."

"I'm quite satisfied, miss," said Miss Tipping, without raising her head.

"There's your relations to be satisfied, Matilda," said Uncle Person, in an important voice.

Miss Tipping raised her head and favored the interlocutor with a baleful stare, whereupon Mr. Person stretching his neck feebly, glanced at Mrs. Tipping for support.

"Our relations needn't come to see us," said his niece at length. "He's improving me, not my relations."

"I'm not improving my uncle, at any rate," said Mr. Person, with a sudden access of dignity.

"You don't mind, Fred, do you?" asked Miss Tipping, anxiously.

"I put up more than that for your sake," said Farmer.

"Never keep a secret in my life," agreed Uncle Person, whose head was buzzing under this unaccustomed praise.

"I know quite enough about Fred," said Miss Tipping, "when I want your opinion, mar, I'll ask you for it."

Mrs. Tipping's reply was interrupted by the entrance of a young man from the jeweller's with four brooches.

Flower, present to the bridegroom, had chosen them and did not take the hapless knight long to arrive at the conclusion that she was fond of bridalmis and was he. His stock of racy was beginning to decline, and the purchase of a second wedding suit within a month was beginning to tell even upon his soaring spirits.

"There's another thing about Fred I don't quite like," said Mrs. Tipping, as she sat with the brooches ranged upon her capacious lap; he's extravagant. I don't like a mean man, but one who flings his money away is almost as bad. These 'ere brooches are very pretty, and they do him credit, but I can't say but what something cheaper wouldn't have done as well."

"I thought you liked them," said the indignant Flower.

"I like them well enough," said Mrs. Tipping, solemnly; "there's nothing to dislike in them. Seems to me they must have cost a lot of money, that's all—I suppose I may make a remark."

Flower changed the subject, and turning to Miss Tipping began to speak in a low voice of their new home. Miss Tipping winced a sort of Eden with bar improvements, and it was rather difficult to find.

They had discussed the matter before, and the shopkeeper had almost quarrelled with his bride-elect over the part of the country in which they were to live. Miss Tipping had left for the east coast, while Flower hotly championed the south.

Miss Tipping, with some emphasis, had suggested leaving it until after the honeymoon, but a poetic advertisement of an inn in Essex catching her daughter's eye, it was decided that instant should be made.

PRACTICAL FARMING

The Best Hours for Winter Feeding

Considerable has been written regarding the feeding of horses in so far as hours of feeding are concerned.

Some would feed twice a day, some three times daily, others would give the regular daily ration in four different lots. We must, in horse feeding, always remember that the horse's stomach is rather a small affair, and that the horse's digestive system is not equipped to handle large quantities in a short time sufcient to last for many hours thereafter. The nature of the horse's digestive tract is such as to indicate that smaller feeds and more frequent but always given with regularity, would be more desirable at more wide separated intervals. On the average farm during the winter season the feeder does not rise very early and it is safe to say that the horses in the average farm stable do not get their first feed before seven o'clock in the morning; get their second feed around about twelve, and either one or two other feeds later in the day where three feeds a day are relied upon, we would favor giving one-half the hay in two feeds; one somewhere around six or seven o'clock in the morning, the other at noon, the other half of the hay to be fed when chores up for the night, which may be done sometime between six and eight o'clock.

The grain ration could very well be divided into two feeds; one in the morning after watering, and the other at night, after watering. At noon turnip, a couple of carrots, or a mangold might be given to good advantage.

But we believe there is a better method of feeding than this. Where the horses got their morning feed about seven o'clock and a noon feed about twelve, both representing fairly small quantities of hay, and where they are watered in the afternoon around four or five o'clock, as is usual on these short days, we believe they would do better to have a very small allowance of hay just after this evening watering, and sufficient to keep them quiet until seven or eight o'clock at night, when they can be very well fed a regular night feed of hay, composing the bulk of the hay ration for the day and their oats, and the quieter he can be kept the better. We would favor this latter system of feeding with the roots at noon as previously mentioned.

We would water twice a day, and the late feeding at night takes the attendant to the barn where he can see that everything is all right, and tends to keep the horses quiet until morning. Farmer's Advocate.

Start Pruning Now.

It is necessary to start the pruning of the apple orchard some time in February at the latest. There are some other jobs for which the farmer wishes to pick good days about this time of the year, such as drawing the ice, sawing up the woodpile and killing hogs, and with all these attended to there is not too much time left for pruning before Spring's work begins to crowd in.

No matter what the system of pruning, or whether the cutting be heavy or light, one thing should always be remembered when pruning in Winter in a country where snow is to be expected frequently, that is, to pick up the brush as you go; a person who has had to straighten out and burn tangled branches and twigs after the snow has been fallen, will be in for a hard time.

With the snow

on the ground

it is best to prune

the trees

as soon as possible.
