The grasses tend to offer too strong competition for the young weed but it is now regarded as a valuable source of roughage and good material for pasturage and a form of legume which is beneficial to the soil. Sweet clover plants grow exceeding ly rapidly and will thrive on soil of legume which is beneficial to the soil.

Sweet clover plants grow exceedingly rapidly and will thrive on soil of low fortility. On account of its rapid growth-if, it is not cut sufficiently early it will make hard unpalatable hay. For roughing sweet clover should be cut at the time the flowers begin to show. Sweet clover plants contain a peculiar organic matter known as Coumarin, which gives it a characteristic odor. At first this is distargeful to cattle; however, they soon learn to eat sweet clover hay and actually prefer it later to poor forms of hay. If a good seeding is obtained, sweet clover will cut at least two or lithree crops a season. If cut early and handled carefully the hay will retain a large percentage of the leaves which are most valuable in the feeding ration. As a pasture, sweet clover is valuable especially if pasture is cut over with the mowen sufficiently often to keep' down plants which would grow up and become woody.
