CHAPTER IV.

The little minister, trotting along between Tom and the girl, chattered glowingly of the work he was doing among the city's outcasts. It was undoubtedly a weary work, and he could not deny that he gladly would exchange the who's of it for just one word from her, whose name he did not even know, at whom he kept casting sidelong looks of speculation, and who maintained a steady, even a forbidding, silence throughout the walk.

Their destination was a shabby building, originally a private residence, next a low-grade lodging house, and now at last a home for friendless girls and women.

"I admit," said the little minister apologetically, "its exterior is not very impressive; but we're doing the best we can with our limited resources, and 'inside'—he paused while removing a bunch of keys from his pocket—"inside," he continued, fitting one of the keys to the lock, "everything is neat and clean, at any rate, and all due to the excellent management of Mr. Buckle—a nice woman, Mrs. Buckle, one of God's own true gentlewomen! One minute now, and you'll meet her, and then you can judge for yourselves."

But they were destined to meet her even sooner than that. The words scarcely left his lip before the door was thrown violently open from within, and there stood before them a gray-haired, elderly woman, face white and eyes disfigured, and trembling from head to foot.

"Thank the good Lord you've come!" she gasped. "I was never so frightened in my life. O terrible thing has happened!"

She proceeded no further. Tom, who was standing beside the blue-eyed girl, afterward recalled that at this instant she emitted a sharp cry. Nauseated by the sickening fumes, he wrenched it open and leaned far out and breathed deeply of the warm night air.

Then, whirling, he surveyed the room in a hurried, sweeping glance,

The rays of a corner are lamp shone pitilessly about a cheap lamp set on with a motionless girl by its side.

Two seconds more and he had her in his arms and was bearing her to the open window. Climbing over the fire escape, and as he lowered her to the iron he heard, the voice of Winifred (at least he knew her first name) call to him from the roof:

"Is she alive? Is she?" The words were tremulous with grief and anxiety.

Tom, kneeling beside the light, still form, laid his thumb to her pulse while loosening her white collar at the throat. He looked up, his face very grave.

"I don't know," he said, and began pumping her arms back and forth as one who revives a drowning person.

"I'm afraid not. But call an ambulance at once."

An hour later Tom was walking slowly through a quiet thoroughfare with Winifred Snow—he knew her last name now.

"It's pretty name," he mumbled out and was promptly astounded at his tenuity.

She, however, evinced no trace of confusion or self-consciousness. She looked at him in sidelong way and her wistful blue eyes, smiling at him beneath her dark-brimmed hat, proved once more disconcerting.

"Do you think so, really? So many people joke about it. They say it sounds too cold."

"Impulsively he thought to answer: "Nothing about you ever could be cold," but he said, instead, conventionally enough: "Some people will joke about anything."

Then she directed the talk into another channel, shyly, as if she feared to become so friendly with this stranger who had misjudged her enough to try to patch up an acquaintance with her on the street, and yet who had proved a friend in need, so unexpectedly.

"I don't believe he meant to be impudent," she thought, and then:

"D'you know," she said, "I'm so excited over Dora, and everything, I can't think straight. But I do want to thank you, more than I say, for what you've done. You've been perfectly kind and I—why, I almost owe you."

To walk beside her was anutter such thoughts as those was enough to turn the heart of a man less effably, he trod on silk, sat down in a glorious dream. Not did he awake susceptible. Ecstatic exhilarated until he heard her say:

"Well, here we are. This is where I live. Thank you for walking home with me."

They stood in a populous street, before a huge brick house of faded grandeur, repellent in its unwashed aspect and air of slovenliness. Upon this structure Tom bent a disapproving eye, and became aware of a window sign announcing "Furnished Rooms," and several men, in shirt sleeves, lounging on the high front steps.

The girl inclined her head toward him, and turning to Tom with a smile, that was half amusement and half contempt, explained:

"My father lodgers." Tom stood with him, holding his hands.

"Tell me," he blundered, "I don't quite understand—why do you—girl like you—I mean—I say I don't see why a girl like you—"

He paused in hopeless confusion. His tongue, hot for the first time, had stuck to his mouth, and he could not speak.

She, likewise, was embarrassed, and was grateful for the darkness which hid the red flush in her cheeks.

"You must know why you don't see why a girl like me should want to live in a shack like that?"

He looked at the "shack" and then at her, and particularly at her neat attire—lacy things and white linen—and nodded, still perplexed.

"I'm sorry I spoke, and beg your pardon, but you see—"

"Oh, don't apologize. But if you were a girl and worked in an office for nine dollars a week, maybe I'd understand. I'll have to go now," she said, turning toward the steps, "and I'll see you again for all sorts done for me—and Dora."

Stark pale "throttled" Tom MacKay. He was losing her. Perhaps, face-to-face, he might have been able to stop after her, feeling his own submerged.

"Miss Snow—before you go, I'd like to give you my name and address. In case you find me—Leisurely added, "in case I could be of any help again."

He drew a card from his pocket, a pencil from another, completed both busily, gave the card to her, and bowed and withdrew.

He had done three blocks before he remembered that he, in his agitation, had written on the card only the name of his hotel. If it was considerably later, he discovered another mistake of importance: the card bore the name of Patrick J. Hibernberry, of the Hibernberry Motor Car Company.

But Frozen Fish.

Fresh frozen fish is just as palatable as fresh fish. Only a few many women do not know how to handle it properly.

The thing to remember is that frozen fish must be defrosted in cold water. When this has been done clean and prepare as you would any other fish and cook in whatever form you desire.

Fish which has been frozen is just as nutritious as any other and ness should make it more known.

No matter how much dross used, fish, when being fried, is apt to stick to the pan's bottom. If a spoonful of dry salt is put into the pan and rubbed over it it will be found satisfactory.

About the House

Knowing and Learning. There was once a woman who thought herself an excellent housekeeper because she did things exactly as her mother had done, no better and no worse. Then there came a guest, a little girl who had learned many things from reading the latest books and magazines, a girl who was always learning. And the woman who had been satisfied with knowing how to do a good housekeeper, she was not an excellent one, for she was wasteful of both time and strength and she had missed all the improvements that had been made on the ways and methods of a past generation. She was an 1880 model of housewife competing with the 1918 type.

The little girl who read and learned mixed the lard and flour for her pie crusts with a fork and used ice water instead of any kind that happened to be available, her crusts were flaky and feather light. She put her dust cloths in an old pall, poured in a little kerosene oil and covered them tightly for an hour. Each cloth was as good as those the woman had been buying of an agent at thirty cents each. She washed beans, peas, berries, etc., in a sieve and the work was wonderfully simplified. She kept a clean newspaper over the kitchen table, changing papers as often as necessary, and much scrubbing of the white oilcloth was saved.

The woman who knew watched her with a new interest in what had been done, come prosaic, dragging housework. When she suggested that boiled salad dressing could be canned just as easily as peaches the woman doubted, but as experience proved that enough dressing to last three months could be made at one time and with a big saving of time, fuel and dishwashing.

The girl who read went back to school but the woman who thought she knew subscribed for three good magazines and set herself the task of becoming the woman who could and would learn.

The Housewife's Part. Again the housewife has to prove to the policeman of food control. Her hands lies mainly the success of making 1½ pounds of sugar for each person in the family for a month. The burden of maintaining the Allied sugar supplies falls on us. There is not enough sugar available for us all to live in our peace time habits. Our great war programme has reduced our sugar-carrying fleet, the sugar requirements of the army are very large; the American crop is less than we expected; we have diverted 50,000 tons of sugar shipping in order that Belgium should have food; German

Gas belched from the room in a stifling flood, and Tom dropped to the floor, dragging the girl and the little minister down beside him. "Lower your heads," he commanded, "and don't breathe deep." Then, cautiously, on hands and knees, he started across the threshold. "And don't follow me," he added.

In another instant he remembered something else. "That gas jet at the end of the hall, turn it out quick! And open all the windows you can find, wide!"

He crawled swiftly into the poison room, across the uncarpeted floor to the window which gave upon a fire escape.

The window was sealed with glue and rags, mucus and trachea, testimony to the careful preparation for death.

Nauseated by the sickening fumes, he wrenched it open and leaned far out and breathed deeply of the warm night air.

Then, whirling, he surveyed the room in a hurried, sweeping glance,
