Are Animals Brainy?

Of course, all animals and insects have a certain amount, of brainpower, but some are actually brainy. Take, for example, a certain kind of ant which build their nest by the sow ing together of a number of leaves. If a rent occurs in this flimsy home they soon set about repairing it in the following manner:,

The ants form a line one side of the tear, and reach across till they are able to soize the other side in their mouths. Then altogether they pull with one gigantic heave till one edgeoverlaps the other. Even now the work is by no means finished. The females scurry away, to return with their infants, which possess spinnarets, though the adults do not. Holding their little ones securely, the ants pinch them, till, in self-defence, they start spinning. They are then moved from side to side of the rent, the minute threads attaching them-Giving Old Furniture a New Lease of not be put in the cupboard at all, selves in the process, and finally mak-
