Shirley Winston was the daughter of "Po" Winston, chief dispatcher of the Mountain Division. Back in her school days she used to bring her lunch to the yards and eat it with me in my call and many times I'm and the school days she used to bring her lunch to the yards and eat it with me in my call and many times I'm and many times I'm and my business to take a in my cab; and many times I've seen her off to her class with a ruined dress. Oh, I did my best, but she knew what she wanted. Yes, she wanted to learn railroading! That was the surprise of it—a girl hankering after a steam through and thrilling to est man vave got. You knew men—

Her father shook his head over her more than once, saying she should have been a man, and prophesying all have been a man, and prophesying all his did more; he did more; he took her with him, taught her about train her with him, taught her about train the day automatic blocks and the handling of freight. Later, when she "Well?" tinished school, she got a job in the station master's office—not because she had to, mind you, but because she wanted it. Then once in a while she would ride with me or some other engineerman, and when my old black horse wasn't drugging anything but the tender I'd break regulations and back here at five-fifteen.
