When they met again it was near the sale-yards, when the main street was throughd with people from the hills. She had seen his horse hitched hills. She had seen his horse hitched to the posts outside McNab's, and so was ready for him when they passed. The path was so narrow that they could not avoid brushing. But Deirdre's chin was well up and her eyes were steady when they met him under his hat brim. Such gloomy, morose eyes they were that she looked into. She almost exclaimed with surprise at them. Her mouth opened to speak. But Davey was as intent on passing as she had been. His face had on ugly, sulled lock, something of his father's dourness. After she had theseed she stood still and watched him.
