FAIR BUT FOOLISH

My step-niece is a beauty, the fairest in the land; the young men call her Cutte, and she's in great demand. She drives around with Willie in Willie's gaudy wain, and all she says is silly, and all she does is vain. You never see her reading the works of E. P. Roe; you never see her kneading a lump of wholesome dough; you never see her sweeping, or making windows bright, or diligently keeping the house fires all alight. And yet she has, dodgast her, her suitors six or eight; I weep when I contrast her with my step-cousin Kate. This latter is a winner, the kind I most respect; and she can cook a dinner that's gorgeous and correct. And she is always dusting, or darning things of mine, she keeps the spoons from rusting, and makes the windows shine. And she would be a treasure as any young man's wife; she'd fill with wholesome pleasure the struggling workman's life. But Kate, whom I've respected since childhood, long ago, is lonesome and neglected, and never lands a beau. Her chances still diminish, as go the days so fleet; we'll see her, at her finish, in some Old Maid's Refreat. And now the motors tooty come honking to my gate, and young men call for Cutie, and bless her as they walt.
