

Love Gives Itself

THE STORY OF A BLOOD FEUD

BY ANNIE E. SWAN.

"Love gives itself and is not bought!"—Longfellow.

"You never hear from them, I suppose?" said Carlotta, in a voice which indicated but a languid interest.

"Oh, no! But I had a letter from Eddie Sanderston the other day. Bobbie, you know. And she says that the Grahams are very intimate at Sturz, and that Peter goes there a lot."

"Perhaps he will console himself," said Carlotta, absently. "say, Judy, you have kept faith with me? You have not dropped so much as a hint to him that I am doing well."

"I haven't thought I had intended to do it dreadfully," and when all these lovely pictures came out in the illustrated papers, I simply ached to post them to him; I was only deterred by the reflection that if he did not happen to be flourishing at the moment, the sight might make him feel worse. But, of course, we really are going to go to New York, he'll have to know—won't he?"

"It will be time enough to decide when we get there," said Carlotta diplomatically. "He still writes from the Forty-second Street address. Graham Max can't leave him send somebody who isn't myself. I have thought of it—instantaneous business, like a very hopeful sound about it. Judy. Someone one always associates a sort of shabby, out-of-the-way person with it, who calls at doors and makes himself rather a nuisance."

"Don't!" said Judy, with a catch in her voice. "It's most awfully, Carlotta! Haven't I thought it all out, and pictured him in all sorts and conditions of occupations? The other evening Claud and I dined at the Principals' and they were talking still about a Cation's son they knew intimately, distinguished scholar of some sort, who was pushing an ice cream barrow in China the last they heard of him! So you can imagine the nature of my imagination!"

Carlotta moaned as if the vision had found its way into her heart. She let out a sigh on that tack, Judy, and her eyes dissolved in tears.

"Don't cry, Carlotta," she remarked, in a maimed voice.

"Right off," assisted Judy cheerfully. "But when I look at you, Carlotta, you're really pretty, and especially dear, and say nothing of your special expressness. I don't mean to be unkind."

"I'm not unkind," said Carlotta, with a bit of a smile.

"I'm not unkind," said Judy.
