An Average Man

There never was a man entirely intelligent, of entirely moral; and H. G. Wells says there never was a man who lived steadfastly, completely and continuously in pursuit of good ends. The best a man can do, the best a community can do, is to make its average a little or a good deal better than the average of mankind. This is success. We are not gods, but animals. One dead man is as good as another, but a living man may, by proper effort, rise above the common herd. And this rising above the common herd is the fitness lying in life.—Ed. Howe.
