Samoan Unrest

The news of disaffection among some of the native population in Samoa, sufficiently grave to cause the New Zealand Cabinet to send two cruisers to the mandated territory, came unexpectedly. For while Australia appeared to be having a good deal of trouble in administering ex-German New Guinea under the mandate system, New Zealand was credited by independent evidence with do ing very well in western Samon.

Tee appointment of General Richardson, the mest popular officer in high command in the New Zealand Expeditionary Forces during the World War, proved a decided success. For a time restrictions on the use of liquor by the Europeans in the interests of the natives tended to make the authorities unpopular, but that difdisturbance in more than one Fren ficulty seemed to have passed away.
