Britain Calls a Halt

In Arabia a holy war directed against the British protectorates of Irak and Transjordan, in Egypt the rejection of the proposed Anglo-Egyptian treaty and in India boycotts against the Simon Commission for an investigation of Indian self-government—these are the significant international incidents in such cases implying to a lesser or greater degree a challenge to British authority which have suddenly sprung up to confront the directors of Great Britain's policy in the East. The course of empire does not always run smoothly.

The sharp and intricate note which has been dispatched to Cairo, demanding Egyptian compliance with the obligations assumed under the declaration of 1922 and reserving the right to take such steps as the British Government "finds necessary" in starting a proof that there will be no further concessions to the Egyptian Nationalists. The proposed treaty represented the maximum amount of independence England is prepared to grant to Egypt. Having refused it, that country must face the consequences of her intransigence.

This note goes further, however, than achieving the immediate aim of laying down the law of Egypt. It is fairly certain that the Eastern world that great Britain is unable to defend her rights. It serves notice both upon the Arabs of the desert and upon the Hindus of India that the idea of empire is not entirely divorced from the British Commonwealth of Nations.

In the announcement that the British authorities "reserve the right to take such steps as in their view the situation may demand" there is a clear indication that inside the velvet glove of concessions and self-governing privileges there is still an iron hand determined to uphold British authority and prestige.

In India especially there has been keen interest in the message in which Great Britain would treat with the nationalist claims of Egypt. Proponents of Swami have pointed to the Indian Congress and advertised that India should not be less than as free as the Egyptian Nationalists, rather than meekly cooperate with a commission on which no Indian representatives are allowed to sit. This is England's answer: Cooperation is your best method of achieving your aims and beyond a certain point you will not go—you must take or leave what we offer you.
