Golf and Business

With the rapid approach of warmer venther, the thoughts of the golfer naturally turns towards the links. There was a time not long ago, when was regarded as bad for business for a business man to play golf. All that has been changed, particularly since the outspoken utterances of the Minister for Overseas Trade in Premier Baldwin's Cabinet, the Hon. D. H. Hacking. "Take your golf clubs with you," he advised the people of Bradford. "Many an order has been obtained through a friendly chat while standing on the fourteenth tee before business has even been mentioned.". Here is a serious-minded man whose business it is to foster business and who bluntly tells the public that it can be effectively fostered on the golf links. There will be those who will challenge his suggestions. | Among then may be numbered M. Briand, who, tradition says, once lost the Premiership of France through letting Mr. Lloyd George show him how to swing a golf club at Cannes. But as against the comparatively few protes tants, there will be many thousands who will endorse Mr. Hacking's sentiments. There are, however, one or two qualifications. This reference to a friendly chat 'while standing on the fourteenth tee" is not likely to neet with the unqualified approval of those of golfers who come up behind such Quebec is no; behind in this sphere of friendly chats and who deplore them philan hropy Our many charitable just as keenly as they do "four-ball and friendly institutions are evidence foursomes" of those who persist in rethat this is to.
