Eighteen "Count 'em", in One Family

The Clan MacLeod arrived in Canada recently by the Canadian Pacific liner "Metagama"—at least if it wasn't the whole clan, it seemed like a large proportion. Donald, his brother Kenneth and his son Allan were leaders of the family groups under Donald's command. Including grandchildren the party, which is bound in bloc for Centreville, Ont., numbered twenty-nine ranging in age from forty-five years to six months. They had a piece of baggage weighing 3,000 pounds.

Hardware man inclined to apply to applicants: "I do, indeed! At my hardware store we have a triple-decker active partner, who is bound to be a success, showing small profits—say, $1,000 a month."

In the money contest at Alpine Lodge School, held yesterday, it was about little Lizzie Lark, who got through hibernation.

At the time of the race, she was a woman of 100.

The Cause of the Great War

"The war which it came was a war for the liberty of peoples, not on account of the violation of Belgium, which was a strategic blunder on the part of the German Government, and to more, but because the peoples of South-Eastern Europe had been fighting for their freedom from its beginning," said Professor Elie Halevy of Paris University, in his Rhodes Memorial lecture on "The World Crisis, 1914-1919: An Interpretation."

"What was responsible for the war was the political rotteness of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, the fact that the principle of nationality, renews and rejuvenated in Asia, was now at work in Austria-Hungary, which was about to split into a number of independent nationalities. Could such an important event have happened without some kind of vision? I do not think it could have happened without a minute of some sort." European diplomacy could work that miracle, and so we had the war.

I Have No Time for Such

WILLA HOEY,

I had a friend, a spirit-bloody and gay.

I thought I knew her, but just yesterday.

We met a dog. I stroked his friendly head,

And she went on, then turned and

"You love these horrid creatures far too much."

I have no time for such."

Since then my heart grows cooler and strength of draft horses, now being used to open up a road adjoining one of the main thoroughfares of Grand Rapids, Mich. So impressive is the horse sense, sagacity, obedience, and docility of these great beasts that they are given honorable mention in the daily papers.

The special work of these animals in this particular case is to pull a great wagon skeleton across the prairie, of which is a steel girder weighing tons. Slowly the trusty creatures roll their burden up the slippery hill. Folks pause to thrill at the strength shown.

But the driver gives all his attention to the task in hand. He feels that on him depends the safety of the load.

His team knows his signals on the reins, and his voice quietly commanding. They dig in their spiked shoes and pull. Vapor streams from their nostrils. And with cheerful forward, they toss their magnificent heads up and down as if saying "Yes" to their kind owner and driver.

The wheels creak on the ice but never falter. The driver knows they must not fail or the task is a failure. Not tightly but firmly the driver holds the reins. He talks to the team loudly, heard by those upon the sidewalk who watch the struggle. Some say it can't be done, others say it can and cheer and encourage both the driver and the horses. Great muscles flex and relax, hoods chip iron spikes into the ice, held by the team going vicissitudes. The beam weighs more than seven tons. The driver couldn't move it alone. One horse would try in vain, but the team and driver have the strength to do the task and do it to them. The master has just "day labor,"—the name pleader.
