He Had No Right to Touch Her Hand—the Brand of Cain Was on His Brow.

By E. ALMAZ STOUT.

TOM STEPHENS sat in his dreary lodging room, his eyes deep sunk in their sockets, staring grimly into the empty grate.

"He had just found out what he had been seeking since he came out of prison ten days ago—the address of his enemy, George Denver."

There had been a time when he had looked on that name as his friend, though even then he had disliked the ruthlessness and indifference of the big, red-faced man, and sometimes he had flown out at him for cruelty to a dog or horse.

But George was well off and generous enough with his money, and Tom had, reason then to suspect the source of his wealth.

It was only later that knowledge came. One day, filled with drink in George's house—drunks that should have been comparatively harmless, but that, unknown to him, had been laced with strong spirit—Tom found himself committed to an action from which, when he was himself again, he shrank with loathing. But that one action had put him in Denver's power. Some time later, when Tom point-blank refused to do a piece of what he called Denver's "dirty work," the latter had threatened him with exposure.

Tom had, long before this, decided that Milly Wayne, the typist in his boss's office, was the one woman in the world for him. Already he had dreams of a home shared with her, dreams that Milly seemed to find very reasonable.

Tom was determined that Milly should never learn of that unsightly act at last agreed to do Denver's will again if he gave her his word of honour that this was the last thing of the kind he would be called on to do. But he was caught, and sentenced to seven months' imprisonment.

While he was in prison, a letter was sent him from his old master, George Denver. It was neatly written and had evidently been written by himself.

"I'm sorry Tom that we had so many bad moments in previous months, but the past is past,"

Allen told him, his old employer. "Just sometime next month I'll meet you again in a branch office. We had in the rear of London, where we last met, and would not be known." This kindly message suggested something to the big-time denizen that had known up in Tom's seat. He gratefully accepted it. "Thank you, sir,"

What had he done? Milly had regained faith in him—loved him still. And he was a murderer. He had killed a defenceless man without giving him a dog's chance. Even though this crime was not brought home to him, he would always know he was a murderer and had no right to touch the hand of Milly Wayne.

That took a week in the London city jail. And he was only barely alive in this brain-macerated daily drugging, reverting to George Denver, he had rallied his life, left it to happiness he'd get him nothing but be cared for. Then, again, his old master, all gone, he had no time to learn he might have been taken advantage of in that way, but he was a bit too much for him.

He took the paper, with shaking hand, and banged down the window again. "Would there be any other movement?" Tom flew up the window and held out a penny.

"Paper, please!"

The record putting down of Braden-stake Title Bank, a relic of the fourteenth century, to be shipped to America and re-erected there, has caused considerable heartburnings in this country.

Americans were the first to discover the movable house, which could be shifted from site to site at will, but most people think that it is simply vandalism to treat ancient and historic buildings in this manner.

The store is now being sold of one man who felt in this way and who was told by an American of various treasures he had seen, and which he planned to buy. Finally he asked the American had never thought of buying Lord Lomond.

"But how would I get it across to the other side?" demanded the American.

"Well, you could lay a pipeline from Canada to the Atlantic." "Even that I don't see."

"Well, you get the other end of the pipeline in your mouth and I will suck as well as you can blow you'll have it over there in no time!"

"Water ices."

Boil together for ten minutes, one quart of water and two cupsful of sugar. Add three-quarters to one cupful of fruit, pulp or fruit pulp. Cool and strain through a sieve or cheesecloth before freezing, with two parts ice to one part salt. Pack to riven in four parts ice to one part salt, but do not leave to stand more than one to two hours without unpacking. This recipe makes about five cupsfuls of water ice.

Some delicious flavorings are:

Three each of bananas, oranges and lemons.

Canned cherries, mashed and a little red vegetable coloring to tint the mixture pale green. Add one-half of a cupful of ground pistachio nuts when the cream is half frozen. Pinch freezing.

One table-spoonful of almond extract and green vegetable coloring to tint the mixture pale green. Add one-half of a cupful of ground pistachio nuts when the cream is half frozen and finish freezing.

One cupful of currant juice. Add one and a quarter cupsful of sugar to the recipe.

One cupful more sugar to the recipe.

Road Vandals In England, Too

Motorists Who Throw Papers and Waste on Property Along Roads are General Nuisance.

Whitstable, on the Chalk Hill—Most appreciative thanks are offered to the scores of motorists who visited some carefully tended Heath and Gorle commons between Henley and Watlington, leaving for the first time the loveliness of the scenery unspoiled by papers, empty tins or other litter. Please come again!

The above notice was published by a London paper. From the grateful tone of this message it would seem that owners of estates along the English countryside have the same trouble with careless or vicious motorists as is experienced in Ontario rural roads. Throughout these areas there is constant warfare against the traveler who leaves behind the discarded, remnants of a picnic to spoil the effect of the landscape.

Indignation Is Aroused

Now is the time when the autoist, who gives no thought to the rights of others, causes endless complications. Of course, this type of tourist is in the vast majority, but many innocent travelers suffer through the misdeeds. Those who throw paper and other litter on the roadway and adjacent property commit an offense which arouses abiding indignation. In many communities stringent laws have been passed to punish the offenders. Aside from penalties a number of clean, solar parking places have been closed to the just and unjust alike.

There is a variety of public recreation centres for the accommodation of tourists. They can park and play at will, thereby, leaving private grounds untouched. In several of these motor clubs there is every requirement for campers and their locations are particularly convenient for any and all who may park, because they have two cupsful of grapejuice, one quarter of a cupful of lemon juice and one-and-a-half cupsful of orange juice.

Two-and-a-half cupsfuls of water may be added, but use only two cupsfuls of lemon juice.
