amazed. "Am I your general manager?" "I'm going to take a chance on you—for a while, anyhow."

CHAPTER XI.—(Cont'd.) His supper eaten, Burney telephoned to the king. "Ken Burney speaking."

"Well, if I've been drawing salary since that night, you are, of course, entitled to my confidence."

"Mr. Graydon informed me that you were your Majesty's middle man and that whenever you instructed a man to report to you that man had better take it on the run or get fired."

"I have, that's the reason you're general manager."

"That's been Art Graydon's policy," the king retorted bitterly. "and where has it gotten us? I had an idea when I made you general manager that I was hiring a fighter, not a pacifist."

"No, they wouldn't," the king contradicted. "Those petty larceny slunks would just help themselves to the evidence and brand the calf anyhow."

CHAPTER XII. "That's been Art Graydon's policy," the king retorted bitterly. "and where has it gotten us? I had an idea when I made you general manager that I was hiring a fighter, not a pacifist."

"That isn't enough money for a bright young fellow like me," Burney replied, "but it will do very nicely for the present and I thank Your Majesty from the bottom of a heart that, of late, has been somewhat heavy."

"I can understand your tragedy and sympathize with it. But that's only tragedy number one. If that lovely daughter of yours should marry some fellow without sufficient cow sense to tail a calf, your kingdom might eventually find itself threatened from within."

"You bet I have," the king admitted, "strangely confidential under the stimulus of this young man's understanding and sympathy."

In England your thoughts turn to teas in lovely gardens and trees. Straw bread and butter, sliced by slice, Strawberries and dotted cream are nice.
