A Trip to the Southland
 (By Wilma Jackson-March)
 At Tazewell, a small town, a few miles south of Cumberland Gap, the road divides, each route having many scenic spots. The eastern route which passes through Asheville, Augusta, Savannah and Jacksonville is a very picturesque trip. The road ascends from an altitude of eleven hundred feet to twenty-four hundred, before it rapidly descends down Saluda mountain at the State line dividing the Carolinas. Here here is a decline of thirteen hundred feet in a space of seven miles. The view from the mountain is very beautiful and it breaks on the car as they should be, the drive down the mountainside can be one of perfect pleasure.

Entering the progressive city of Greenville one sees many cotton factors. The location, with an altitude of three feet, above the sea, makes this city a favorite of the cotton world. Augusta is a very old city, which prospers mostly from its great cotton mills. But it is best known for its dry and delightful climate and as a health resort.

Applying County, the seat of the largest producer of turpentine and sweet potatoes, of any county in the world. Lumber and lumber products, cotton, honey, peaches, livestock, melons and tobacco also add to its wealth.

The Georgia pine trees being tapped for resin and turpentine are very interesting. This wood called "Fat Wood" is very heavy and burns brightly with a blue flame, making it a favorite for the fireplace. The pecan groves yield a rich income to those who care for them properly. It was not the season for cotton so we saw only a few fields, which had been gathered. It is a pretty plant, with its soft little bunches of snowy down, ready to be plucked by the sworthy hands of the Southern cotton folk. If we attempted to balance the cotton on our heads, as so easily do, we would find it rather a difficult task.

Savannah is a delightful city to visit. It lies eighteen miles from the ocean, on high land along the Savannah River and is one of America's most distinctive and charming cities. Its quaint old buildings and colorful history, make it a popular touring objective. The climate is semi-tropical, the latitude being the same as Los Angeles. The drive from here to Jacksonville, a distance of one hundred and fifty miles, over a fast highway pavement, is a pretty one, which takes you close to the ocean at several points. The word "pretty" as used in the South, applies to anything, which is bright, gay and beautiful. One frequently hears the expression "It is a pretty day." It is a pretty phrase, which has drifted north, "It is a seeing you." This has a touch of friendly intimacy about it, which makes one feel a little more important and necessary to the lives of those about you.

Jacksonville is the industrial city of Florida, with four hundred and seventy-five industries and is a great centre for lumber and naval stores. It claims the best all year climate, drawing a great many tourists by its normal living expenses, its motoring and surf bathing at the beach, trips on the St. John river.

It was most thrilling to cross over the beautiful old Suwannee River in Northern Florida. Upon a log near shore a row of turtles were enjoying the sunshine. One could almost imagine they heard the darkies crooning that old familiar tune.

It claims the best all year climate, drawing a great many tourists by its normal living expenses, its motoring and surf bathing at the beach, trips on the St. John river.

It was most thrilling to cross over the beautiful old Suwannee River in Northern Florida. Upon a log near shore a row of turtles were enjoying the sunshine. One could almost imagine they heard the darkies crooning that old familiar tune.

Lake city is a pretty town with many tourist camps and its beautiful Veteran's hospital. Its surrounding lakes offer good fishing and boating. It is an important gateway to the State and many tourists spend their first night in Florida at this point. Likewise, many who are returning north find this a convenient stop, perhaps wishing to spend one more night in the sunny state before bidding it farewell.

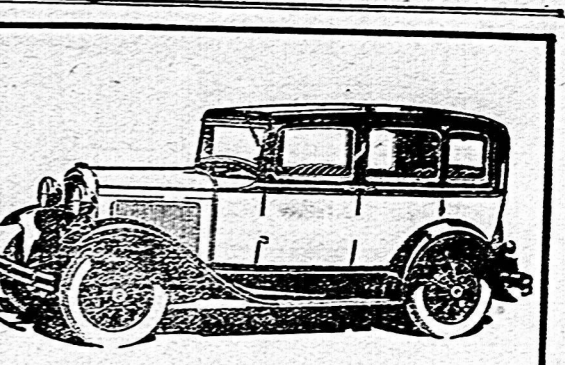

Each district in Florida is noted for some particular type of growth. We were in the citrus fruit belt, and directly south of us, a few miles, at Plant city was the strawberry centre. The past winter was not a particularly good winter for this fruit, as there was more cool, wet weather than for many years. The strawberry season lasts from the middle of January till May. Perhaps it is the type of plants, the light sandy soil and the cool nights which prolong the season. Many schools in that district close the first of February and re-open in July, so that the children may pick berries. It is most interesting to watch the packers sorting, grading and packing the fruit. The pickers begin work shortly after daylight, as the crates must be at the shipping centre by noon, to catch the Northern Express. Many of these berries have reached their destination in the Eastern States by the following day. Each picker is given a number of boxes, with a little card containing his number. He picks only good berries for his box or he will be told to discard all berries which are soft or have been touched by the birds or rabbits. When a box is full he leaves it between the rows. It is then picked up, placed on a tray and carried to the shelter, where the packers take it to a bath of cold water, to remove the sand, lifted gently with the hands and placed on the sorting table. At the beginning of the season, produce gets as much as $1.00 and $1.25 per quart, or first class berries. Carloads of berries leave for the north daily. By April and May we were buying a fair quality of berries for 5 and 10 cents a quart.

If the citrus fruit groves are well cared for and of good quality, there is a rich return to the grower. Many of the northern market send buyers, who test the fruit from each tree and buy it in carload or truckload lots. This is also the case with watermelons, peaches, cucumbers, melons and sweet potatoes. One sees whole fields of these products, also cabbage, squash and celery. Most all winter we bought delicious large fresh bunches of celery at our door for five cents a bunch. Irish potatoes, apples and milk were the only foods which were higher, all these being the same or cheaper than in the north. If one is near the gulf on the east coast they can go fishing and in a short time get more than they can use. I heard of one family, camping at Bradenton, about 10 miles from the gulf, who were fishing daily, catching many fish of different kinds and selling them about the town. It was said they made more than enough to pay their living expenses. Trout, mackerel and mullet are the favorite varieties and certainly are wonderful eating. The latter sells for 10 cents per lb. while the others mentioned sell for 15 cents dressed. Fish, which live mainly upon smaller fish and live seafood, have to be dressed before packing, while those which live upon plant life do not. At the docks, where the fish are sorted, hundreds of pelicans and myriads of birds are underfoot, or unwholesome rats are thrown into the water. Then there is a mad scramble, till the water seems fairly alive with them. Large trucks come to the docks to be packed with fish of many kinds, to be taken to the canneries. After the days' fishing is over, one sees many large nets drying upon the racks on shore. I had imagined old fishermen, enjoying their pipes, as they mended the nets, but instead, I saw mostly young men performing this task.

A party of six of us, camped on the gulf for a week and enjoyed it very much. We had a stucco bungalow of four rooms, with every convenience, for one dollar a day. Every morning, when ready for a swim, we looked for pretty new shells, which had been washed ashore by the waves during the night. The salty air and water are invigorating and gives one a ravenous appetite. While we were bathing one morning, a fish, which appeared to be about four feet long and a foot high, swam near us, into very shallow water. We were much more afraid than it appeared to be, so we could not describe it very accurately.
