What of The Future?

Politicians of every party are very free with their promises for a world which the boys overseas will be proud to return to and happy to live in. But none of them have shown just how this sort of world can be achieved. If you set out to build a world fit for the returning men, how would you begin?

Politicians, for the most part, pin their hopes to some sort of economic, social or political planning. There is the Beveridge Report in England. And, though none quite so famous, the Beveridge proposal has its counterparts in post-war planning here.

The difficulty with such plans is that none are better than the people they depend on. Sir William Beveridge himself declares his whole report depends on the existence of "courage, faith and a sense of national unity." This means that it depends on the existence of courageous people who live out their faith in God, and who have found a common mind and learned to work together. The mud slinging raised by the election campaigns and the industrial disputes continuing all through our national emergency, suggest we have not yet become that kind of people.

How can we, while battling out such differences, find a "sense of national unity"? We will have to learn to jettison every doctrinaire point of view. We will have to go into every discussion with the single purpose of doing our best for others and the nation, whatever the effect on our own fortunes.

Any fool can look after Number One. Any fool does. But the men of the future are the statesmen and the ordinary men who together rise above self-interest and give everything to build up their nation.

Two thousand years ago it was said: "See ye first the Kingdom of God and all these things shall be added unto you." If, in this way we get the courage, faith and sense of unity we need, post-war plans will become practical. A world worthy of the sacrifices that have been made will be possible. How you plan will certainly affect such a world. But how you live is the real key for its attainment.
