"Great Work"
CO-OP
"Oh the great work men could do on this earth! Oh, the achievements of grandeur and worth—We could accomplish if we, like the team, would each do our bit in perfecting the scheme... If all... did their own tasks with a glad willing heart... Putting together instead of apart."
 —Patience Strong

By "Mutual Aid" Canadians supplied wartime allies with food, clothing and munitions. By mutual aid, too, Canadian farmers did their part. By helping each other they planted and harvested the crops which meant so much to the United Nations. At harvest time groups of neighbors worked first at one farm and then at another. Farmers from different parts of the same province, or even from different provinces, became harvest "neighbors" under government-sponsored farm labor interchanges.
 Another form of mutual aid among farmers—purchasing and marketing co-operatives—played an important part in achieving Canada's food production records, and is even more vital now in this time of rehabilitation and reconstruction. These co-operatives reduce farmers' costs, increase their returns from the sale of produce. These co-operatives increase output, improve quality, and reduce the cost to the consumer. At the same time they raise the farm standard of living, increase rural buying power, build self-respecting citizens. They contribute to the prosperity of township, village, town, city and nation.
