Huge crowds are attending the week-by-week fixtures of clubs en-gaged in the championship of the English League. Attendances be-fore World War II were 750,000; they soared to 1,000,000 on the resumption of league soccer in 1946; and since then the graph line has shown a non-stop upward trend. Or This topped the previous best, 1,164, 614, established at the beginning of he new season last August.

The English soccer season lasts by a simple calculation, it will be 40,000,000, or just about twice that of the United States baseball tally. For those who would like to go into the comparison a little more deeply, it should be explained that in the English soccer league there which each contest 42 engagements while in baseball there are 16 teams.
Following a recent decision by the National Arbitration, to which the delegates of the Players' Union took their case after disagreement over wages with the Pootball League Committee, the professionals of the English clubs now receive a minimum weekly wage of £7 ($28) when working at top pressure during the season and £5 in the summer. The maximum was advanced to £12 in the season and £10 in the summer. These financial limitations apply equally to the national cup tournaments, with the exception that a club may pay men an extra £2 each for taking part in a third creasing amounts to £12 for a final. The total maximum is £24.

The reason for this relatively insignificant remuneration for the chief performers in a great show In that it is considered to be in the a team game. Those in control say there is no such player as a "match winner." Unsupported, no player, however skillful, could win a match, and, as a rule, a great deal of any operation of teammates on the field of play. Also, insist the soccer auth-orities, it is only a wage limitation which makes possible the maintenance of professional soccer clubs all over the country. If clubs were game would obviously become an affair only for big clubs in populous Against this the players retort that the team is an intricate ma-chine, and that if the machine is to be geared to high-power efficiency then the constituent parts required must be appropriately paid for. The players are also aware of the substantial profits the big clubs are making—despite entertainment tax—and although they know that inmost cases these profits are plowed back into the game, they feel they should have a say into which field the relationships should have a say into which field the rel should have a say into which field the plowing should be done.

Buried Cities

The Balkans correspondent, Ken-neth Mathews, spoke recently about the team of British archaeologists in Turkey, who, with the help of Turkish scholars, are trying to ex cavate a buried Greek city of the ninth century before Christ. Matthews observed: This will be the first British Dig in Turkey since was founded in Ankara last winter with the blessings of the Turkish Government." Sir Leonard Wool-ley, the world famous discoverer of buried cities, is also looking for some of the tombs of the Hittite Kings. These expeditions are a sign of growing friendship between Britain and Turkey, because Turkey has been suspicious of British archaeologists since Lawrence o turn into soldiers.

"The great Kemal, the father of modern Turkey," said Matthews. "gave his countrymen precise directions about this type of research. Dig', he said, 'and learn to dig from those who know how.' He bequeathed part of his private fort-une to archaeology and to-day Turkey has some notable scholars in the field. The Turks already have fifteen thousand historical monu-ments to be dug. How many more are waiting to be dug out of the ground the Greek, the Roman, the Byzantine and the Ottoman Turk Byzantine and the Ottoman Turkish; but the most fashionable, if one may use such a word about these vanished ages, seems to be the Hittite. In case, like me, you have to ask who the Hittites were, they were the masters of the great plateau of Anatolia for a thousand years before the Greeks at Troy. The Turks are now preparing in Ankara a museum which will be unique. No other in the world will so imposingly display the whole sweep of the ly display the whole sweep of the Hittite civilisation. The museum has ten domes and round it runs a covered gallery. It's an awe-inspiring place now, in the cathedral-like gloom under the dome has been set up a gate-way of an ancient Hittite city guarded by two carved lions. Inside the walls are lined with have culptured glabs of basalt and huge sculptured slabs of basalt and limestone: there seems nothing which is not gigantic within sight which is not gigantic within sight.
Then as you bend your eyes on the details, you dimly see the whole monstous procession, the stiffly-standing Kings pouring libations; the gods with forked lightning in their hands, the bulls, the griffins and the sphinx.

and the sphinx.

There are fourteen archaeological teams digging in Turkey this year; each will hope to make some discovery, putting all earlier discoveries in the shade. And this is eminently possible in Turkey where sevburied cities are known to exist which have not yet been found.
