Through the distant gateway came a rider. Virginia knew at once that it was Steve Barron. He had a stiff but easy way of sitting on a horse that marked him from other men. He dismounted a little way off and came to the house on foot. He was still dressed for the trail, coatless, his trousers thrust into cowboy boots, a gun belt about his slim middle. He swept off his sombrero and came smilingly onto the porch. "I've come to say adios, Virginia," he said "That is, unless there is some favor I can do." "There is a favor, Steve," she

"Anything." The way he said it was meant to convince her; the was eagerness in his voice. - What wonld you have me do? Attack Natchi's band singlehanded? "Steve, you're melodramatic!" He laughed. "My mother Mexican. Her father true Spanish. The Spanish, I'm told, are very gallant toward beautiful ladies."
"Now you flatter me."
He shook his head in denial. "I think you are very beautifut senorita. But the favor, Virginia?" "It is not very much," she said. "Tell me about your quarrel with my fiance, Phil Lawrence." "So you heard? Did Lt.
