In the first world war the term "Salvation Army Lassie" was the favorite description of many for everyone who wore a bonnet of blue with scarlet facings. These "Lassies" endeared themselves to the troops by their selfless service, often under fire. They added that quality of service to the distribution of refreshments that transformed, for weary, embattled men, "coffee into nectar and doughnuts into manna from heaven." And the fighting men didn't forget!

But the spirit of service was the same, and the reaction of the fighting men was exactly the same, "Hallelujah Lassies" became "Sally Ann," and the term and symbol of the Red Shield became a pass-word in canteen and other auxiliary operations. Millions of sheets of notepaper bearing the Red Shield found their way back to Canada from all the battle-fronts of the earth, so that the folk at home became almost as familiar with the symbol as the uniformed husbands and sons.

But how and where did the Red Shield originate? The Salvation Army, as almost everyone knows, bases its principles and practices upon the Bible, and the choice of this symbol is no exception. In the Book of Nahum, the Prophet declares: "The shield of his mighty men is made red; the valiant men are in scarlet."
The allusion is appropriate: "mighty men with red shields," the warriors of right and helpfulness. And while The Salvation Army has taken the red shield for its symbol, it would be the last to claim for itself the title of "mighty men." Its spirit is essentially modest though its wish and will to serve it vigorously ambitious.

Red is the color of courage. The Shield is a weapon both of offense and defense. Its more sentimental connotation is also apt, for since its inception The Salvation Army has been "Shielding" the hungry and the homeless, the sorrowing and the sinning, in all parts of the world, and not least of all in the Dominion of Canada.
