Goat's-Beard Was English Delicacy

Goat's-beard was classed as a delicacy in the England of Elizabeth the first. The roots, boiled and buttered were much preferred to parsnips or carrots. These roots were dug as needed or stored in sand. In the winter months they provided the poor man with the taste, if not the meat, of oysters—hence the description of the weed as "oyster plant".

These plants also had a spiritual virtue: they were dried over the fires which burned on St. John's Eve and then hung in the house and barn to protect man and beast from evil. These edible, spiritual and medicinal properties were probably attributed more to the purple or field goat's beard than to the yellow flowered species which is more common in Ontario.

Goat's-beard grows two to five feet high and has narrow, grass-like leaves, points out the Field Crops Branch, Ontario Department of Agriculture. When broken, a milky sap runs out. The flowers are somewhat like small sunflowers, and all close by noon. Hence, another name is "Johnny-go-to-bed-at-noon". Seeds are spread by a parachute-like appendage in the same manner as the seeds of dandelions.

Nowadays, with fresh and frozen vegetables available the year 'round, few people eat goat's-beard roots. Even fewer use it as a charm against evil. Sixteen ounces 2,4-D acid in at least twenty gallons water, applied early, when the plants look like oversized grass leaves, and before the blossom stems start to form, will kill this untidy inhabitant of roadside and uncultivated areas.

The Ferguson Highway, North Bay to Cochrane, was completed in 1927 during the regime of the late G. Howard Ferguson. A motorcade from Northern Ontario points comprising 400 autos arrived in Toronto on September 6, 1927, after traversing the highway. The 1,500 Northerners involved were guests of the City of Toronto for two days. The highway is now a popular section of Highway No. 11.
