THE CLYTIE.

(From Chambers' Journal.)

CHAPTER IL

Five long years had passed, each epenting its story of the seasons and still Marian Elton was unmaried. One suitor after another came and went to the disappointment of her family and the wonder of her friends. Her faithful friend and confident, Amy, alone knew the truth which her mother partially guessed when she used to say, "That I Bread will be delivered daily at the Clytie has bewitched you, Marian, Wedding Cakes, Tea Cakes, destal; you have never been the made in the very best manner, and kept > she knew her mother's surmises were but too true, and she feared to pain her by confirming them.

> It must not be supposed, however, that she was unhappy all this while -far from it. After the first wild burst of sorrow was over, she found consolation in duty, study and the affection of those around her. To all these she returned with redoubled energy, and the re sult was, that at thirty years of age Marion Elton, so far from de veloping a tendency to old maidish-ness, had ripened into a character of ennobled worth. The only pro blem people ever hazarded about her was "why she never married." Occasionally, when alone with her Clytie, the old sorrow would feed anew, as she thought of the past, and the similarity of their

But suffering, she argued, though differing in intensity, was the lot of all. There was no life without its hidden wounds, some scarred over by the healing hand of Greatly Reduced Prices Time; others, again, that would never cicatrise; but one and all were bearing on their hearts some mark of painful encounter on the battle-field of life.
