

ONE AND TWO.

If you come to bed,
Or if I take to you,
The world will go on, I think,
Just as it used to do.

THE PRESS AND THE FLOW.

We envy not the princely man,
In city or in town,
Who wears a wreath of pumpkin vines
Turned up about his nose.

Schneider's Tomatoes.

Schneider is very fond of tomatoes.
Schneider has a friend in the country who raises "garden seed and such."

Ignorance of Canadian Geography.

A story has come to us, vouchered for by a clergyman, to the following effect:—A member of a firm in England, having an agency at Hamilton, Ont., being desirous of sending one of their representatives to Canada on a "prospecting tour,"

A New Subscriber.

We got a new subscriber on Wednesday. When we answered his knock at the door, he slid in, took off his hat and asked: "Is this do newspaper shop?"

The woman's question.

"What shall I wear next?" An enquirer for yacht is politely termed a floating doct.

A doctor's motto is supposed to be patients and long-suffering. Advice to the brimstone controversialist—Let hell enough alone.

A Washington woman has applied to be appointed a constable, despairing of ever catching a man in any other way.

The great difference between the young and the old is this:

the young have the world before them, while the old are behind the world.

Statistics show that the number of suicides in all civilized countries is yearly on the increase. The wear and tear of life is also increasing.

The Chinamen who San Francisco is so anxious to get rid of are heartily welcomed in Peru, where there are now some 70,000 of them.

If you want to take the gimps for the street car conductor by offering him your face as he comes along.

There are two things that double up a man with startling rapidity—the misery of an uneasy conscience and the unpaid interest of a promissory note.

The best thing ever said of ghosts was said by Colingridge, when asked by a lady if he believed in them. "No, madam; I have seen too many to believe in them."

A retired New York sea captain has a pet crow named "Jack," which takes its grog like an old salt. It will take down at a dose a half glass of raw whiskey, after which it gives a hoarse croak of mandarin delight, and falls over on its side. Its recovery is rapid, and it soon walks off. This dissolute bird is in the habit of getting drunk two or three times a day, and the more it drinks the better it seems to thrive.

THE REWARD OF THE JOURNALIST.

It has been said that the actor must have his reputation in the glare of the footlights. He need expect nothing from posterity. It will know nothing of him except through impalpable and untrustworthy tradition. It is even truer of the journalist—it is truer of him that of any other man whose life business touches so closely the business and lives of the public and of all the individuals who make up the public—that he must reap the reward of his work while he is doing it. He contributes, perhaps, more constantly than any other worker, to the entertainment and instruction of the public, but he never sees the public; the public never sees him; they are never brought eye to eye and under the influence of sympathetic enthusiasm of that relation. But the hearty and earnest worker in journalism, to the born journalist, his work is his joy and reward.
