LOCAL MATTERS.

The American Newspaper Reporter says: "There appears a growing tendency for sermons reporting among the country editors, following the fashion of the 'blanket-sheets.' This practice is questionable. In the first place, they are not read by one-tenth part of the readers of any paper; and the space can be utilized to a greater profit to a majority of the readers. Secondly, they are very imperfect, and give but a vague idea of the discourse as they are brokenly presented, and bereft of the impressiveness thrown around them by the speakers, and have no real effect upon those who read them. Thirdly, the sermon can interest, but it few outside the sanctuary in which it was delivered. Those who hear it would not care to see it presented in an unattractive manner. For the majority of the readers, that may be laid down as a general rule—that people will and have a sermon if they do not particularly care for it, but if they do care to see it in the local journal."
