received intelligence of the capture of two more of those gigantic cephalopods, or devil fish, for which Newfoundland of late years has become celebrated, and these are of such enormous size as to throw into the shade all the previous specimens of these monsters of the deep which have been taken. In 1873, I described in your columns the first perfect specimen of the giant outiles ever obtained, and which it was my good fortune to secure. It was captured in a harring-net in Logie Bay, three miles from St. John's. The body was seven feet in length, and five and a half feet in circumference. The long arms or tentacles were 24 feet, the eight shorter 6 feet. Since 1873 several other spedimens have been cast ashore, but all were destroyed by the fishermen, who o course did not know that they were of any impertance. In September, 1877, a fine specimen was taken in Catalina, Trinity Bay, and brought in a perfect condition to St. John's, where it was exhibited for several nation which escape by the chimney carry days, and then purchased for the New York Aquarium, where it attacted thousands of the perfect decomposition of the body, a visitors. It was afterward exhibited in the certain quantity of organic particles not enleading cities of the United States, and realized a large sum of money for its proknown by that peculiar burnt odour which prietors. No doubt, as it is the only periect specimen in existence, it will continue to attract attention and to be a source of revenue. The body of this specimen was 10 feet in length, the tentacles 30 feet, and the shorter considered by sanitarians to be perfectly in-nocuous, and, in fact, it is clear that molearms 11 feet. The ten arms had on them not less than 2,000 suckers.
