CASTLE GARDE. CHAPTER I. ARRIVAL HOME. "Your foot will soon be on your native heath now, Jack."

"I was walking the hurricane-deck of the mail-steamer Comstock, our sisters buttoned to our chins and our caps tipped down over our eyes. It is a wild morning, and we are having what is technically called a 'dirty' passage across the silver streak of sea."

"What do you mean?" I exclaim, staring at him. "Nothing," Jack Carew answers, laughing grimly. "Except that I am going to be married."

"I was a boy. She is my second cousin. It was all arranged for us by the parents long ago. Her father married an English heiress, and he wanted her English money to patch up the old place in Ireland."

"I know what troubles me; but I can't say what they are. I am not sure, but I think I am in love with her. I have loved her ever since I was a child. I have loved her ever since I was a child. I have loved her ever since I was a child."

"I was a boy. She is my second cousin. It was all arranged for us by the parents long ago. Her father married an English heiress, and he wanted her English money to patch up the old place in Ireland."

What she is in the case. As for me, I find myself... I have had a very few differences that I observed between the people whom I met and those among whom I had come...
