It took a whale year of vague unrest and constant wandering up and down the carth to convince Ray Harding that, after all, Mildred Heatherte was not any the less loveable for her capracious humbrs, and that, whether she was or not, he could not possibly get through life without her. It was a full year. I kay, before he arrived at this conclusion, and three months more before he could so far overcome his pride as to seek her once more But one beautiful September morning saw him get out of the train at the little country village, where Mr. Heathcote's country seat was, and hasten down the road thwards the boase. He found Mildred's father, with whom was but slightly acquainted, asleen on the front piazza! Tue old gentleman awake-ill natored of course, and the gentleman was informed rather shortly that Miss Heathcote was at the cit and not expected down until the o'clock train. In no ve y complacent humor he returned to the village tavern, where he found a passably good dinner and managed to doze away good portion of the alternoon. At little just 4 o'clock, unable to keep still any longer, he sauntered out and firelled off down the road where crossed the railway. With no par ticular object in riew, he turned uside
