Therefore, you may quite understand how great was my astonishment when the long-haired man addressed me as though-But, wait; I have not told you who the long-haired man was.

day, and had arranged everything so that my mind would be quite at ease. Business I put aside for the present; and having provided myself with the correct costume and accessories of a gentlemanly traveller, went out to attend to the last few arrangements for my journey. I had been into the bank to draw several hundred dollars, and had also stopped at the jeweller's to get my watch, which had been repaired. At the first place I had noticed a solemn man of thin figure, with black hair, as straight as an Indian's, and wearing a pair of blue goggles, who asked the cashier to change a five-dollar note, and then politely stood aside in order that I might transact my business first; and while I was paying for my watch be entered the jeweller's and bought a pair of plated silver sleeve-buttons. I hardly know why I took particular notice of him, but his hair, his festures, his stoping shoulders, and long, supple hands, were all so peculiar that I could not avoid noticing them particularly. He might have been a travelling evangelist, I thought, or a country doctor, or a literary man, or connected with some spiritualistic society, or a member of the Liberal Club. I could not place him. I laughed at my self for desiring to do so. Why do I sare what that men is? I asked myself; or think of him as I am thinking? With these words I jumped into a stage, and as I was paying my fare, became aware that another person had entered the vehicle, In fact, I seated myself, by accident, upon his knee, and turning to apologize, I saw the person of whom I was thinking. "I beg pardon," I said. "Not at all, not at all," he cried, with a great display of politeness. "Not at all. It was my fault. I should have moved every Saturday night, and am fast gliding to a drunkard's grave." "You mock me!" oried the stranger holding up a warning finger. "You mock me, sir. "You say to yourself, "I am s moderate drinker. Bir, the mania which you speak of in jost may blight your life at any instant. You may see little green snakes, which have no existence anywhere but in your own imagination, crawling out of your boots before you leave this stage. I assure you it is possible, air." "Not if I drop dead from nicotine poisoning," I remarked.

The two girls, who had been laughing all the while, went into something very like hysteries; the other lady passengers, devoid of any sense of hamor to a woman, listened approvingly, with the air people assume in charch during a sermon, and seemed to regard me as a very dreadful example in-class of girls-"Now, what do we learn from this parable of the wise and foolish "Beware, repeated my neighbor. "The virgins?" Girls, decidedly-"That we path is short and very slippery. You are shall watch hourly, that we miss not our going down it headloug. Beware!" I had enjoyed all this at first, but I now lost all patience. "Beware yourself," I replied, in as calm a tone as I could command. "Even cranks are occasionally knocked down, as you will find, if you do not hold your impudent tongue."

At this my neighbor fumbled in his coattail pocket, brought out, with much pains and deliberation, a large yellow kerchief, and applied it to his eyes. "I speak for your own good," he cried.

from its depths. "I felt it my Christian duty to pause and strive to rescue a wandering sheep. You revile me for it, but will try to bear it. That's my daty, too. Yes, yes, yes - that's my duty, tod.". The girls choked again. The matrons string. My adviser caught my arm, "No, no," he said. "I will go. I am about to leave you, sir."

." I am delighted to hear it," I remarked, seating myself." "Yes, yes; I go. My presence is offensive to you, and I go," he continued. " It is my duty. Good-bye! Good-bye! Let me put your hand upon your heart." He returned. He seized my hand and thrust it into the bosom of my coat. "Do you think a heart could beat like that for many bours together?" he shrieked. "Bir, your complexion, your respiration, your whole appearance, prove to me that I am right

I thrust his hand from me and snatched mine away. He looked at the sympathetic ladies, shook his head, and jumped out of the stage. The girls shricked with laughter. At the next corner they alighted. was alone with the matrons, who regarded me with freezing glances, and seemed to be somewhat afraid of me, as an intemperate person who might do them harm. One, who were a little frizette of black curls, remarked to her friend, in a hard and re-proving tone of voice: "How shocking is intemperance!"

To which the other replied : "Shocking, indeed!" And then I saw all eyes settle slowly upon my middle vest button. I glanced downward, almost expecting to see those small green snakes so graphically described by my late neighbor. Instead, saw the broken links of my watch chain. My watch was gone. I plunged my hand into my bosom. The pocket-book containing my money was no longer there. In fact, my pockets were completely emptied : even a couple of cigars which I had about me had been taken; and the long-haired man was evidently a clever thief. The policeman with whom I took counsel was sympathetic, but not hopeful. He said that, from my description, he should suppose the theft to have been committed by "Blim Jim," a noted pickpocket; and that the two girls apposite were doubtless his accomplices, trained to giggle in order to attract my attention at the proper time : delightful to think of it.
