The exceeding low prices which the goods are now selling off at attract tens of the mands of customers, who throng these enormous stores so that frequently there is scarcely room at the counters for them all, and the whole length of both stores, 275 feet long, is crowded daily. This great sale has been got up on the principle of giving every customer extra good value in all they buy, while some hold lotteries in which only one in perhaps 5,000 will get anything, while the principle of depending on the wheel of fortune for our wants has an immoral suffuence on all who do so, and is rumous to both the public and private welfare. Some defend this wicked place of getting off their goods by abusing their competitors who would not stoop to such a degrading mode of procedure, and make statements about them which have not the lightest foundation in truth. Irstead of resorting to cowardly modes of defence, let them show by moral law that lotteries are harmless, and give up their quibbling, their above and their false insloustions.
