POETRY.

Of all the tender and comfortable things That now and then sweet memory brings There's nothing dearer that love recalls Than the old-fashioned house with its white-washed walls.

THE OLD-FASHIONED HOUSE.

Not a mansion to-day, though a maryel Can ever usurp its place in my heart. For there my earliest prayers were said, And I slept at night ma trundle bed.

'Neath coverlids reaching from feet to chin, By a mother's hand tucked gently in, . . And a good-night kiss on my tired brow— Oh, earth holds no such blessing now! The garden was fragrant in flower beds

Where marigolds lifted their velvet heads.

And warmed by sunshine, refreshed by dew, The bachelor-button and touch-me-not In the river that curved like a shepherd's Whose latch string hung invitingly out, And many a stranger supped at its board. While blazing logs in the chimney roared. Off, this is an age of reform and change! And things æsthetic, modern, and strange-Improvements that sayor of silver and gold-Are superseding the cherished and old.

But I turn from palaces built for sliow, With mansard roofs and stories below Of frescoed, kalsomined, dadoed halls, To the old-fushioned house with its white washed walls.

OUR STORY.

WAS SHE FRIVOLOUS?

The Rev. Mr. Shaw contrasted greatly with his surroundings-his spotless cloth fitting so well his strong, manly figure, his lear-cut Grecian features, and dark wavy hair thrown back with careless grace from is smooth brow.

He was visiting one of those wretched tenement houses used by the very poor, and before him was a forlorn group. A widow who had just buried her husband; she had five helpless children-the eldest six, the youngest a nursling baby, and pair of twins among them. The rags, and, worse than all, the dirt of poverty verywhere apparent. An expression of almost sublime pity rested on the countenance of the minister. The woman, with the apron thrown over her head, rocked herself to and fro, and wailed forth her troubles. "I don't know what I'm a goin' to do for myself and the little 'uns. Though my old man would have his drink, he didn't beat us, and brought enough to keep body and soul together, but now I know we can't do nothin' but starve and die." " Have you no friends ?" asked Mr. Shaw

"Some; but as bad or-wuss off than us-Yes." she said, looking up with a grateful, bright expression, "there is one-Lord bless her! who has done a lot for nie-Miss Mehitable Sanks. She sent medicine and the doctors to the old man, and guy me clothes and suthin' to eat; and many's the man, woman and child that blesses her for takin' care of 'em. Why, sir, she even leaves little cards with stamps on 'em, and Job Potter, who can write, sends 'em to her when we are in a very bad state:"

anat he would do what he could for her, the minister wended his way home. As he thought of those to whom he might appeal, a vision of a bright face haunted him, but, while he lingered over the thought most tenderly, there was a shadow on his brow as if there was some slight jar that marred the harmony of his thoughts.

Mr. Shaw was the rector of one of the wealthy churches of the city, and ManBelle Lee was one of the parishioners. Her face was Madonna-like in its tender curves and beauty, the large blue eyes with just a tinge of sadness, the perfect curve of the red lips, a faultless complexion, and blonde hair that was like a halo of light around the graceful head. But ab, when she talked it was like damper, a mist on a beautiful picture. marring the tints that otherwise would have

Bright and witty, but a butterfly; such devotee to society that one longed for the expression of a single serious thought that could leaven into something like common sense this personification of frivolity. With it all, however, she was lovely and lovable to every one, and Mr. Shaw had long struggled against an interest in her, the indulgence of which he felt would be fatal to his future happiness and usefulness.

Absorbed in these thoughts he found him self in front of Mr. Lee's house, and, obeying an impulse, he turned into the gate and of me was sufficiently good for such a thing. Do you know," with a sudden droop of the eyes, "that you always make me feel as if am doing something wrong."

"Do I? Well, I shall give you a golden opportunity now to redeem yourself. I have just been visiting some of those wretched poor families in - street, and I would like it so much if you could interest some ladies in their behalf-visit them and relieve

A look of consternation overspread her retty face as she exclaimed:

"Oh, indeed, you don't mean for me to go there? How could I ever stand it! I can't boar such places. Ask me almost anything else. The dreadful men and women ?-the odor! Ugh!" with a shudder. "Ask me almost anything else."

A look of keen disappointment diffted, over Mr. Shaw's face.

She suddenly brightened and said : I do intend to do something good next week. I have refused a German," trium phantly, "that I may attend the Charity Calico Ball to be given. You know all the dresses are for the poor, so I shall do some

"And what is your dress to be ?" asked Mr. Shaw, with rather an indescribable inflection to his voice.

"The loveliest blue silesia, with a flowered cretonne front," enthusiastically, sleeveless waist, Mendici collar, shirred and very bouffant draperies. It will beautiful, and I know it will seem very nice to some poor woman, who never had anything like it."

"Yes," he said in a tone quite saturated with irony, "I don't doubt its usefulness but don't you think you ought to add a few more yards of illusion to make some warm odies for those who have no fires, and lew yards of ribbon to decorate the little freezing arms ?" "Now, you are angry with me, Mr Shaw," hesitatingly. Don't think me utterly heartless; but I can't go to-street It would really give me a little blue chill. "I could never consent to such a crue thing as that," he said, with an unpleasan smile. "I really feel that I owe you ar apology for intruding such a disagreeable subject, particularly after your nerves were shattered with your novel. Good morn ing," and he bowed himself out very ab ruptly, with a strange little pain in his

He did not again allude to the subject her, but found other ladies who interested themselves warmly in the work. Everywhere that he went in his charity rounds he could see and feel the influence of Miss Sanks' good acts. She seemed be an angel of mercy, who never tired, and who devoted her entire time to charity All that she did was marked by a practical good sense and a depth of thought and feeling that he could not fail to admire Still he chanced never to meet her.

One day, when entering the post office he saw in advance of him the graceful figure of Ma Belle Lee. | She was unaware of his presence, and, standing idly behind her, he felt as if he had received an electric shock as she asked:" Is there anything for Miss Mehitable Sanks?" and then received and pocketed several postal cards. If he was astonished at the question, he was still more so at the effect which his discovered presence produces on her. Her face and neck, even to the roots her golden curls, were dyed in a painful crimson, her eyes dilated with an expression of consternation, but with a little haughty gesture of recognition, she hurried past Acting upon an impulse, with a few hasty After assuring her of his sympathy, and istens he soon overtook her. He was lost in a bewildering surprise. She was the last person with whom he would have connected Miss Sanks in any way, and her great agitation, as he walked beside her, increashaste, " are you Miss Sanks ?"

A sudden burst of tears was her only answer, as she hastily pulled down her veil and walked silently beside him. A calm of perfect joy descended upon him as he realized the truth. He walked by her side until he reached her home, and then, without invitation, entered it with As they reached the parlor she tossed aside her hat and stood before him more like a discovered culprit than the little saint she had proved to be.

There was a defiant sparkle in her eye as she turned her flushed face to him He took both of her hands in his. "So, Ma Belle, Ma Belle," he murmured tenderly, "your heart is as beautiful as your face, though you have veiled your goodness under an exterior of frivolity

Now is the time te Gather Seeds.

To the Editor of the FREE PRESS, Sin.-Everyone is beginning to admit that the chief beauty and often one of the principal values of a farm is its possession of wind-breaks and sheltering plantations Those who wish to procure these and have the misfortune to reside on farms destitute of them, will find that though it be the slowest, it is yet an excellent method t sow tree seeds for themselves. Seed is this year, plenty in the forest, and this is the month for gathering the following:

Sycamores, mountain ash, English ap native ashes, basswood, buckthorn, an hawthorn, locust, oaks, hickorys, walnuts butternuts, beech, chestnut, pines and other evergreens, hard maple, and ash-leaved maple, or as it is now called Manitoba

If they wait to gather these till some dry day, after the first frost it will be found best The maple, ash, and such seeds, as well as all kinds of nuts, should be kept in a cool dry place, till they can be sown. Seeds which have (like the mountain ash) a pulpy covering, will need bruising by a hoe or macerating through the hands, the pulp matter them washed off, and the seeds partiallsdried, when mixing with sand will facilitate the sowing process. The fall is nature's time for sowing seeds, and w shall not go far wrong if we imitate ther A light loam is the best, but in a clay soil covering the seeds with sand does well. is well to cover the seed twice the depth o itself, and tread it firmly down. The cover all with about two inches of leaves, straw, corn-stalks, or strawy manure They must be so mulched to ensure success In the spring, this, if of a fertilizing nature can be raked between the rows, and will keep the weeds down, and the soil moist, if too bulky, remove it altogether. Next sum mer from a small bed thus treated, you will obtain thousands of plants of any variety you have sown; and these transplanted out the next- season, will soon be fine young trees, far better rooted, and therefore more likely to live, when finally planted out, than forest seedings
