POETRY. lines on the Death of the Late Mr. Donald Duff. Stratherrick, Scotland,

Father of Mr. John Duff, Erin.

What is it that ails thee, Stratherrick, fair vale? That the mirth of thy homesteads Is chang'd into wail That thy groves and thy gardens No longer do bloom, And thy heath covered hillsides Hang o'er thee in gloom?

Is the sword of the alien Unsheath'd at thy breast? Or hath pestilence' scourge Thee bereft of thy best? Or hath blight of fell famine O'er spread thy fair brow? Say, why sad and silent, Stratherrick, art thou?

Friend, peither hath famine, Nor sickness, nor war. Cast o'er me the shadow Thou seest from far. But the hand of Jehovah, 'Neath which we must bow, Hath the "silver cord" broken,

His people brought low!

A watchman of Zion Hath gone to his rest. Oh. Death! will nought serve thee But that which is best? Thou hast ravaged our Highlands, Thy soythe hath out down Our princes, our nobles,

Our men of renown. Then, sure there is reason We sit sad and lone : Amid the world's music Ariseth our moan; Those stars where was mirror'd Jehovah's own light, Have departed for ever And left us in night.

Yet the night shall have morning The Lord hath it said; His voice shall yet waken The sleep of His dead; The Bridegroom, in great gladness, Arouse shall His Bride, And enthrone her in glory,

With Him to abide! And who shall claim kindred That day with the Bride? When her Lord shall avouch her. Shall we be outside? Ah! yes! if we tread not The paths that she trod;
"Her people—our people."
And her God—our God!
