Miss Grey's Thanksgiving.

OUR STORY.

"Thanksgiving Day !" Miss Asenith Grey enipped off a fresh, needleful of thread, glaucing as she did so from her window to the meat shop across the street, where there were suspended a score or more of turkeys, of various size and conditions. "To-morrow is Thanksgiving Day," she repeated; "and I suppose we will take the early train for Aunt Nancy's, Jean?" But Jean Witherell tossed her head im

You can take what train you like," sh retorted. "I shan't go to Aunt Nancy's." Not go to Aunt Nancy's?" Asenith Grey's round blue eyes grew rounder with astonishment, as she repeated her cousin's words, half sceptically. "You-you don't really mean it, Jea ?" "I do mean it!" flashed Jean, energet cheeks, such golden lashes and chestnut ically. "I ain't a-going to spend my substance a-going to Aunt Nancy Throckmorton's, when I can get as good a dinner, if not better, here, and save my money, too We pay our board here, and Mrs. Hill won't deduct a cent, if we do go."

But Aunt Nancy and Uncle Enoch Jean? They will be so disappointed." Asenith looked reproachfully at her cousin, but Jean only shook her head deter-

"I can't help it if they are," she declared I've got to look out for myself, and I've made up my mind to keep my money, and not spend it a-going to the country, just to please Aunt Nancy and Uncle Enoch. And you are a goose if you go, Asenith Grey. You ain't so young as you might be-five years older'n me, at the very least, and Wholesale and Retail Dealer in Marble, you'd ought to be a looking out for yourself us. her cousin when she chose. "I don't expect to be 'settled' as you say," she retorted; "and if I did, I should not stop going to Aunt Nancy's, where was born, and always lived till I came the city to earn my living. It will cost me a few dollars, to be sure; but I don't begrudge the money. And somehow or other, roast turkey and pumpkin pies don't have the same flavor on a dingy boarding-house table that they do in the country, with the big maple tree brushing the south window and Aunt Nancy's old-fashioned china and silver decorating the table." " Pooh! What nonsense!" sniffed Jean "As if vittles didn't taste just the same whatever you eat 'em on. But 'taint any of my business. Spend your money a-running to Swamp Holler, and be an old maid, if you like. "'Pears like we hain't got nothin' in per tickler to give thanks for, either, wife," he continued. "You half crippled with the rheumatiz, an' me jest a-gitting over the fever an' ager. But then, we're alive, an'I reckin we'd ort to be some thankful for that, Anyhow, it's Thanksgivin' Day, an' we must hey somethin' a little extry for dinner, so I'll go an' kill that turkey-hen, I reckin, ef 'tis the last of the flock."

"Yes, Enoch," assented Aunt Nancy, "you must kill the turkey-hen on Thanksgivin' Day. 'Pears like we did hev bad luck with that flock of turkeys. Only twelve hatched out of a settin' of seventeen and the varmints ketched all of them bu one. I s'pose we'd ort to be thankful they didn't git her, too."

"An', thank goodness, I saved pumpkins enough for a good batch of pies, I was afeared they'd freeze that last cold snap, but the corn-shock where I hed 'em stowed away kep' the cold off so they didn't even git frost-bit."

"I must hustle now, an' git things a-goin'," said Aunt Nancy. "'Twon't be no great of a dinner after all; but it's the best I kin do, an' I reckin Asenith and Jean will be glad to see us, anyhow." "Humph! Now, what's the use of grum-'blin', wife?" commented Uncle Enoch "Roast turkey an' pumpkin pies, with some of your cup-custards an' home-made bread, is good enough for the king or anybody else. If 'taint, they're welcome to stay away. But I must gear up the critturs now, an' | sant? go down after them gals."

And by the time Uncle Enoch and th sorrel team made their appearance at the station, Asenith Grey and Mr. Gabriel Throckmorton had managed to become quite well acquainted with each other.

" How nice and tall he is," thought Ase nith, blushing very pink beneath the gaze of Mr. Gabriel's handsome brown eyes. While the young lawyer mentally admit ted that such blue eyes and velvety pink brown curls, never had existed before, out side of a story-book. And though Aunt Nancy's dinner of roast turkey and pumpkin-pie, cup-oustards fer you. Ma got one jest like it las' week and home-made bread, was all that the most exacting could desire, two at least of the party were sadly deficient in appetite, and only disposed of their share of dinner from a sense of duty. Three weeks later Jean Witherill received a letter from her Cousin Asenith. "DEAR JEAN," it said, "I am going to be married on the third of next month, to a cousin of Uncle Enoch's, Mr. Gabrie Phrockmorton. So you can get a nev oom-mate as soon as you please. He is lawyer, and owns that row of brown-stone houses opposite Mr. Hill's boarding-house We are going to live in one of them after we are married, and you must come and see ASENITH GREY.'

"Asenith engaged-and to a rich man, too!" grumbled Jean. "An' me cooped up here, working like a beaver fur six dollars a week! But that's allus the way- I never have any good luck. Mebbe if I'd a-gone down there Thanksgiving Day I'd a-got him though. But who'd a-thought of making such a match at Swamp Holler? I didn't I'm sure, or I'd have gone, too."-Helen Whitney Clark.

..... Canadian Clover.

Within the last ten years, the reputation f Canada's clover seed has advanced in pace with her reputation in cattle and spoon dairy products, and to-day our leading grass seeds stand in the London market above the products of all other countries, both in quality and cleanness. Germany and France lately stood first, but now our Alsike clover brings 25 per cent. more; our red clover, 5 to 10 per cent, more; and our timothy, 15 to 20 per cent. more than German, or any other seeds. THE CANADIAN CLUB.

Homelike Institution in New York Where Visitors from Canada find a Hearty Welcome

Last Sunday's N. Y. World gave an interesting and lengthy discription of the Canadian Club in New York, with short sketches of a few of its leading members. The following is selected therefrom :-New York with its large foreign population, has but one distinctively foreign social club with a building of its own and an organization modelled upon that of our best clubs: and it is due to the enterprise of some of the Canadian citizens that this has been accomplished. Among the 16,000 Canadian residents in New York there are hundreds who have achieved wealth and social prominence. When it was proposed to found a Canadian club the idea met with such enthusiastic response that at the first meeting over one hundred signed the roll, and an amount of money was subscribed that at once assured its success.

The building No. 3 North Washington square was secured and fitted up in a tasteful manner. Although in the first year of its existence, the membership at present numbers about three hundred and is rapid ly increasing. A series of weekly entertainments were inaugurated to which members, their families and friends were invited, and programmes of such an inviting character were offered that the rooms of late on an occasion of this kind have been uncomfortably crowded. The President of the club is Mr. Efastus Wiman, one of the best known Canadians resident in the United States. Mr. Wiman is President of a great telegraph company, the great Northwestern Company of Canada, he is a director in the Western Union and the head and front of the Staten Island Rapid Transit Company. He however, manages to find time to cultivate the social graces, and his appearance at the club and its entertainments is always a signal for a delightful evening. The Secretary-Treasurer is Mr. William B. Ellison, a lawyer at 229 Broadway. He is known in the club as the energetic member. Much of the club's management devolves upon him, but he is equal to any
