HEROIC JIM.

The broad Mississippi, down which noble steamer was gliding, gleamed in the moonlight like a pathway of molten silver, the far-away shore on either hand had faded from sight altogether, and the deck was deserted. Creeping like the dreadful hydra, now with lifted curling crest, then lying closely to the bales of goods, and writhing slowly between barrels and bags, there came toward the open hatchway a little thread of smoke-the ship was on fire !

Suddenly there came a cry, a few hurried orders rang out, the great whistle sounded with a loud shrick, and the captain, officers and crew gathered in fear and haste. "Where did it begin?" "Can it be overcome?" "Is there a chance to save the steamer?" "We can only fight it, hoping for the best. Call the passengers, head the boat toward shore, and let every man work for his life;" and the captain set the example by throwing off his coat and springing to the force pump that supplied water to the long hose. and no one mered forward. "Will you die like cowards? Is there no man among you?" cried the captain. "Yis, massa; dar is!"

As the clear tones rang out over the heads of the people, a lithe black figure darted forward, nimble hands seized a rope, sure feet found the ladder, and before s word could be spoken, before anyone could prevent the lad, Jim stood half revealed in the flery furnace of the pilot-house, the great wheel was in his grasp, and the noble ship yet obeying her rudder, turned back again, headed toward the bank once more, Ask your druggist for a, bottle.
