Poetry.

JUBILEE TEMPERANCE SONG.

Air—"John Brown."

Quick response, my temperance comrades, to the ringing trumpet's call,
In the cry of saddened millions, drinking wormwood mixed with gall;
Pleading with you not to falter, not to let the banner fall;
For death still threatens on.

CHORUS.
Glory, glory, hallelujah!
Our cause will win we do assure you.
Glory, glory, hallelujah!
For God is leading on.

Don't you hear the clank of prison chains and shriek of maddened brain?
Have ye pity none for victims who redemption seek in vain?
We must stop this desolation of our world for cursed gain,
That good may march along.
Glory, &c.

In this conflict for the freedom of our homes, and church and state,
We contend with this abhorrence, cannot love the trade has turned to hate,
To this we give no quarter; push the battle to the gate;
And peace shall march along!
Glory, &c.

Let the brewer and distiller, and all drunkard makers hear,
That their day of retribution swiftly, surely draweth near;
While their cup of compensation brimmeth o'er with wrath and fear,
For justice marches along!
Glory, &c.

They say our "Local Option" does not do the good required,
Our answer is, "All laws are weak till people's hearts are fired
With conviction strong, and purpose true, and zeal that's never tired;
Then the law goes marching along!
Glory, &c.

Some are asking "compensation" for repression of their trade,
Well, they'll get it when they yet outlet for the rum is laid under,
With the balance left (?) we'll carry the late jubilant "Victualler's Aid,
As the world goes laughing along.
Glory, &c.

Ho! ye heirs of "Magna Charta," loved to fame of knightly deed,
In the lists of "Human Suffering" the modern Runnymede,
Ere ye become all for "Rum," for His scruttleer doth read,
How your cause goes marching along.
Glory, &c.

Be ye brave of heart, my brethren, and behold the dawning bright
Of the better day that's coming with the triumph of the right,
When human life shall taintless be, from drink's accursed blight.
That day is marching on!
Glory, &c.

Let the hammered hosts of temperance keep the goal of faith in view;
"Prohibition" be our watchword, for the love of Christ be true;
Till the promise is fulfilled, and the "Heavens and earth made new,"
For Christ is marching on!
Glory, &c.

THE LITTLE LIE.

BY STEPHANIE GRAY.

"What are you looking for, mamma?"

"I am looking for a bank-note that I left on the mantel-shelf last evening. Have you seen anything of it?"

"A what? A bank-note? No, I haven't seen such a thing. Where was it?"

"Here, on this shelf. Your father handed it to me when he first came in, and as I had no pocket in the dress I then wore I laid it on the shelf, thinking that when I went up to my chamber I would carry it up. And I remember that I set the shade-lamp upon it, so that it should not be blown away. It is very strange. I cannot think what can have become of it. You and Lydia were here last evening."

"Yes, mamma."

"And Albert Worthing came in, did he not?"

"Yes; he came and stopped, perhaps half an hour."

"And you saw nothing of the note?"

"What was it, mamma? How big a note?"

"Ten dollars."

"I wouldn't worry about that."

"It is not the loss of ten dollars, it is my carelessness that troubles me; and your father will know that I have been careless."

"Why do you say anything to papa about it? I wouldn't, if I were in your place."

"But I must go to him for another ten dollars; and he must know. I declare,"—searching over the shelf once more—"it is strange where it could have gone to. You, of course, saw nothing of it, Lydia?"

"If I had, dear auntie, I should have told you at once."

"Well, I am sorry. And it was such a handsome bill—one of the new issue. Your father said the first he had seen, and he kept it on purpose for me. But it is gone, why—there is the end of it." And thus speaking, Mrs. Evans left the room, her daughter, Kate, and her niece, Lydia Hapgood, remaining behind.

"O, Kate! how could you tell your mother that you knew nothing about that note?"

"Because, I did not know."

"But, Kate, it was just the same. You remember, when you moved the lamp and something fell from the shelf into the fire, that Albert sprang forward and tried to save it, but was too late. You know he exclaimed at the time that he believed it was a bank-note."

"Yes, he thought it was. But what has that got to do with my knowing or having seen it? O, pshaw!" the pretty girl cried, with a toss of her sunny head, "what's the use of being scolded when there's no need? I certainly didn't see any bank-note; and if Albert hadn't said what he did, I shouldn't have known that it had ever been there."

"Still, dear Katie, you deceived your mother. You did certainly tell her a—a—"

"O! you mean a fib—a lie. Well, it was a very little one, at all events; and, certainly, no harm can come of it. I'll run the risk. And now, Lydia, let us get ready for our ride. You know Albert said he would be here at eleven o'clock, and it wants only fifteen minutes of the time." And the light-hearted, light-headed girl flew away towards her chamber to dress for her ride.

Kate Evans was eighteen years of age, a pretty, bright-eyed, good-hearted girl, volatile and frolicsome with lessons of life yet to learn. She was daughter and only child of Samuel Evans, one of the foremost of the lawyers of the great city.

Lydia Hapgood was cousin to Kate, a daughter of Mrs. Evan's eldest sister, two-and-twenty years of age, a thoughtful, pleasant-faced woman, quite [illegible] her home a score of miles up the river, she being at the present time on a visit to her Aunt Evans.

At eleven o'clock a stylish team drew up at the door of Mr. Evans's comfortable dwelling; and from that carriage alighted Albert Worthing. He was Kate's accepted lover; a young man of two-and-twenty; tall, muscular, and perfectly proportioned; with a face the very mirror of all that was good, and true and generous in man; a handsome, honest face; a face that might lead any woman to love and to trust. He had just been admitted to the bar, and those who knew him best foretold for him a high and brilliant forensic career.

Albert had not long to wait. They went off happily, and be sure they knew how to enjoy themselves.

Later in the day Mrs. Evans was obliged to confess to her husband, the loss of the bank-note and to ask for another in its place.

Samuel Evans was not a man to worry over the loss of ten dollars. Only the day before he had given ten times that amount to a benevolent object; but he didn't like to have money disappear in that way. He wanted to know what had become of it. A bank-note could not have gone off of its own accord. He went into the drawing-room with his wife, and she showed him just where she had laid the note, and how she had set the heavy shade lamp upon it, so that it might not be blown away. She had put it there just at dusk, on the previous evening, and the only ones who had been in the room since, to her knowledge, were Kate, and Lydia, and Albert Worthing. She did not believe any of the servants could have been in there. Nothing could have called them—or any one of them—in that direction, she was very sure.

"It is very curious—very," said Mr. Evans, gazing vacantly upon the spot where the bank-note had been laid. "It could not have moved without help."

"Of course it could not."

"Was there a fire in the grate last evening?"

"Yes. You remember, it was rather chilly, and as Kate wanted a bit of warmth, I let John put up a fire,—just a bit,—enough to last a few hours."

"John could not have—"

"O, John had built the fire, and had been gone half an hour when I came in, and I know he did not come back, because he asked me if I could spare him to go down town for the evening."

"Well, well,—if that bill should ever turn up, I think I should know it. However, here is another; and I hope you will be more careful of it."

On the following day Mr. Evans took his wife to a ride to High Bridge. Of late he had kept no horse of his own. He had occasion to use a horse so seldom that he found it not only cheaper, but far more convenient to hire. So he went to the stable where, for a long time, he had been in the habit of hiring, and engaged a coach for the afternoon, to be at his door at one o'clock.

The team was promptly on time, and both Kate and Cousin Lydia went down to see mamma snugly tired in the carriage, and they hoped she would have as good a time as they had enjoyed on the previous day.

On the return, Mr. Evans helped his wife from the coach at their door, and having seen her safely in the house, he resumed his seat, and rode back to the stable, near to which resided a man with whom he had important business. At the stable he alighted, and went into the office to pay his bill, tendering to the clerk a twenty-dollar greenback. In the change returned to him was a ten-dollar bill—a note of the latest issue—a crisp, new note, which—He started when he saw it, for he believed that the only note of that description yet put in circulation in the city, had been given to him, two days before, by a friend of the Treasury Department. Could this be the same?

"May I ask you," he said to the clerk, "where you got this note?"

"Certainly, sir. It was given to me, last evening, by Mr. Albert Worthing. I think the team for which he paid was sent to your house."

Mr. Evans returned to his house in a cloud of deep and harrowing anxiety. In his mind there could be no doubt about that being the bill which he had given to his wife. Could it be possible that Albert had taken it? O! he could not believe it. And yet—ah! stranger things had happened. He must think. He would not speak to his wife quite yet. He would see Albert first.

And he met the young man on the following morning. He was not a man to beat about the bush with a character like that of Albert Worthing's.

"Albert," said he drawing the youth aside—his very look and tone gave to his auditor a shock that startled him from his equilibrium—"you were at my house, in the drawing-room, on last Monday evening?"

"Yes, sir," answered Albert, stricken with a great wonder.
