MONKEYS AND SPECTACLES.

It comes from the following story told in the New York press, and is a specimen among them of a strong dislike to eye-glasses.

A man with puffed eye-glasses leaned close to the bars of the monkey cage in a showy museum last night, watching two who were doing a trapeze act.

As he watched, a young monkey stole slyly up, and thrusting his paw into between the bars, suddenly snatched the glasses from the man's nose, jabbed them into his mouth and danced away chattering.

The keeper recaptured the glasses after considerable difficulty, and, as he returned them to the owner, said:-

"You have learned something curious about monkeys, sir. Don't wear glasses when you go near them. They snitch either their eye or their cap, and they'll grab them every time."

"When I was in London Zoo they used to have signs stuck up warning spectators not to place goods within reach of the monkeys. When they find they can't chew them up, they smash them."
