Would Ensure Prosperity. Every one should aim to improve the town in which he lives and the only way to do this is to boild up every man, woman or child in the place. People are so connected socially and dependent upon each other that it is impossible for one to prosper without all his neighbors directly or ndirectly being benefited. This being true t follows that those who are envious of others and seek to pull them down, are not only enemies to the place in which they live but stand in the way of their own
